To HAVE, hăv. v. a. (75). Pret. and Part. pass. Had. To carry, to wear; to possess; to obtain, to enjoy; to contain; to be a husband or wife to another: it is most used in English, as in other European languages, as an auxiliary verb to make the tenses, Have the preterperfect, and Had the preterpluperfect: Have at, or with, is an expression denoting resolution to make some attempt.

HAVEN, hā'v'n. s. (103). A port, a harbour, a safe station for ships; a shelter, an asylum.

HAVER, hăv'ŭr. s. (98). Possessor, holder.

HAUGH, hâw. s. A little meadow lying in a valley.

☞ This word, though for ages obsolete, or heard only in the proper names of Fetherstonehaugh, Philiphaugh, &c. seems to have risen from the dead in the late whimsical deception we meet with in some gardens where we are suddenly stopped by a deep valley wholly imperceptible till we come to the edge of it. The expression of surprise, Hah! hah! which generally breaks out upon a discovery of the deception, is commonly supposed to be the origin of this word: but the old word Haugh is so nearly related to the signification of the new term haw haw, that it seems much the more natural parent of it.

HAUGHT, hâwt. a. Haughty, insolent, proud.

HAUGHTILY, hâw'tē-lē. ad. Proudly, arrogantly.

HAUGHTINESS, hâw'tē-nĕs. s. Pride, arrogance.

—nŏ, mŏve, nŏr, nŏt;—tŭbe, tŭb, bŭll;—ŏil;—pŏund;—*th*in, THIS.

☞ This word is in more frequent use than the word To hale, and seems to have a shade of difference in its meaning. To hale seems to signify the forcing or dragging of a person; and to haul, the forcing or dragging of a thing; and is generally used in sea business, or on ludicrous occasions to a person, as, To pull and haul one about.

HAUL, hâwl. s. Pull, violence in dragging.

HAUNCH, hântsh. s. (214). The thigh, the hind hip; the rear, the hind part.

To HAUNT, hânt. v. a. To frequent, to be much about any place or person; it is used frequently in an ill sense of one that comes unwelcome; it is eminently used in apparitions.

☞ This word was in quiet possession of its true sound till a late dramatic piece made its appearance, which, to the surprise of those who had heard the language spoken half a century, was, by some speakers, called the Haunted Tower. This was certainly the improvement of some critick in the language; for a plain common speaker would undoubtedly have pronounced the au, as in aunt, jaunt, &c. and as it had always been pronounced in the Drummer, or the Haunted House. That this pronunciation is agreeable to analogy, see Principles, No. 214.

To HAUNT, hânt. v. n. To be much about, to appear frequently.

HAUNT, hânt. s. Place in which one is frequently found; habit of being in a certain place.

HAUNTER, hân'tŭr. s. (98). Frequenter, one that is often found in any place.

obey; to try, to attend judicially; to attend favourably; to acknowledge.

HEARD, hĕrd. (234). The preterit of To hear.

☞ We frequently hear this word pronounced so as to rhyme with feared. But if this were the true sound, it ought to be written beared, and considered as regular: the short sound like herd is certainly the true pronunciation, and the verb is irregular. Mr. Sheridan, Mr. Nares, Mr. Smith, and W. Johnston, mark the word as I have done.

HEARER, hēre'ŭr. s. (98). One who attends to any doctrine or discourse.

HEARING, hēre'ĭng. s. The sense by which sounds are perceived; audience; judicial trial; reach of the ear.

HEIGHT, hīte, or hāte. s. (253). Elevation above the ground; degree of altitude; summit, ascent, towering eminence; elevation of rank; the utmost degree; utmost exertion; state of excellence; advance towards perfection.

☞ The first of these modes is the most general; and the last, the most agreeable to the spelling. Milton was the patron of the first, and, in his zeal for analogy, as Dr. Johnson says, spelt the word height. This is still the pronunciation of the vulgar, and seems at first sight the most agreeable to analogy; but though the sound of the adjective high is generally preserved in the abstract height, the h is always placed before the t, and is perfectly mute. Mr. Garrick's pronunciation (and which is certainly the best) was hite.—See DROUGHT.

To HEIGHTEN, hī'tn. v. a. (103). To raise higher; to improve, to meliorate; to aggravate; to improve by decorations.

HEINOUS, hā'nŭs. a. (249). Atrocious, wicked in a high degree.

☞ Mr. Sheridan gives the long sound of e to the first syllable of this word; contrary to every Dictionary, to analogy, and, I think, the best usage; which, if I am not mistaken, always gives the first syllable of this word the sound of slender a.

HEINOUSLY, hā'nŭs-lē. ad. Atrociously, wickedly.

HEINOUSNESS, hā'nŭs-nĕs. s. Atrociousness, wickedness.

HEREDITABLE, hē-rĕd'ē-tā-bl. a. Whatever may be occupied as inheritance.

HEREDITAMENT, hĕr-ē-dĭt'ā-mĕnt. s. A law term denoting inheritance.

☞ Dr. Johnson and Mr. Barclay place the accent on the first syllable of this word; Dr. Ash, Mr. Sheridan, Mr. Scott, and Entick, on the second; and Dr. Kenrick, W. Johnston, Mr. Perry, and Bailey, on the third. The last accentuation is not only most agreeable to the best usage, and the most grateful to the ear, but seems to accord better with the secondary accent of the latter Latin Hereditamenta. See ACADEMY.

HEREDITARY, hē-rĕd'ē-tā-rē. a. Possessed or claimed by right of inheritance: descending by inheritance.

HEREDITARILY, hē-rĕd'ē-tā-rē-lē. ad. By inheritance.

HESITATION, hĕz-ē-tā'shŭn. s. Doubt, uncertainty, difficulty made; intermission of speech, want of volubility.

HEST, hĕst. s. Command, precept, injunction.

HETEROCLITE, hĕt'ĕr-ō-klīte. s. (156). Such nouns as vary from the common forms of declension; any thing or person deviating from the common rule.

☞ Mr. Sheridan, Dr. Kenrick, Dr. Ash, Mr. Perry, Buchanan, Barclay, and Bailey, unite in placing the accent on the first syllable of this word; Entick alone places it on the third. Mr. Sheridan and Buchanan place an accent also on the last syllable, and make the i long; while Dr. Kenrick and Mr. Perry make it short. That the accent ought to be on the last syllable cannot be doubted, when we consider how uniformly we remove the accent higher when we anglicise Latin words by shortening them; and though the i in these terminations is rather ambiguous (156), it certainly inclines to the long sound which Mr. Sheridan and Buchanan have given it. —See ACADEMY and INCOMPARABLE.

HETEROCLITICAL, hĕt-ĕr-rō-klĭt'ē-kăl. a. Deviating from the common rule.

HETERODOX, hĕt'ĕr-ō-dŏks. a. Deviating from the established opinion, not orthodox.

HETEROGENEOUS, hĕt-ĕr-ō-jē'nē-ŭs. a. Not kindred, opposite or dissimilar in nature.

☞ There is an affected pronunciation of this and the two preceding words, which, contrary to our own analogy, preserves the g hard. The plea is, that these words are derived from the Greek, which always preserved the gamma hard. To produce this reason, is to expose it. What would become of our language if every word from the Greek and Latin, that had g in it, were so pronounced? What is most to be regretted is, that men of learning sometimes join in these pedantic deviations, which are only worthy of the lowest order of critical coxcombs.—See GYMNASTICK.

To HEW, hū. v. a. Part. Hewn or Hewed. To cut with an edged instrument, to hack; to chop, to cut; to fell as with an axe; to form laboriously.

HEWER, hū'ŭr. s. (98). One whose employment is to cut wood or stone.

HIBERNAL, hī-bĕr'nāl. a. Belonging to the winter.

HICCOUGH, hĭk'kŭp, or hĭk'kŏf. s. A convulsion of the stomach producing sobs.

☞ This is one of those words which seems to have been corrupted by a laudable intention of bringing it nearer to its original. The convulsive sob was supposed to be a species of cough; but neither Junius nor Skinner mention any such derivation, and both suppose it formed from the sound it occasions. Accordingly we find, though hiccough is the most general orthography, hickup is the most usual pronunciation. Thus Butler:

"Quoth he, to bid me not to love,
"Is to forbid my pulse to move;
"My beard to grow, my ears to prick up,
"Or, when I'm in a fit, to hickup."

To HICCOUGH, hĭk'kŭp. v. n. To sob with convulsion of the stomach.

To HICKUP, hĭk'kŭp. v. n. To sob with a convulsed stomach.

HIGH-WROUGHT, hi'râwt. Accurately finished.

HIGHLAND, hi'lând. s. Mountainous regions.

HIGHLANDER, hi'lând-ûr. s. An inhabitant of mountains.

☞ We sometimes hear a most absurd pronunciation of this word taken from the Scotch, as if written Heelander. It is curious to observe, that while the Scotch are endeavouring to leave their own pronunciation and adopt that of the English, there are some English so capricious as to quit their own pronunciation, and adopt that which the Scotch strive carefully to avoid.

HIGHLY, hi'lê. ad. With elevation as to place and situation; in a great degree; proudly, arrogantly, ambitiously; with esteem, with estimation.

HIGHMOST, hi'môst. a. Highest, topmost.

HIMSELF, him-sêlf'. pron. In the nominative, He; in ancient authors, Itself; in the oblique cases, it has a reciprocal signification.

HIN, hin. s. A measure of liquids among the Jews, containing about ten pints.

HIND, hind. a. Compar. Hinder; Superl. Hindmost. Backward, contrary in position to the face.

☞ This word, with its comparative hinder, and its superlative hindmost and hindermost, are sometimes corruptly pronounced with the i short, as in sinn'd; but this is so contrary to analogy as to deserve the attention of every correct speaker.

HIND, hind. s. The she to a stag; a servant; a peasant, a boor.

HINDBERRIES, hind'bêr-riz. s. The peasant's berries; the same as raspberries.

HOGSFENNEL, hôgz'fĕn-nĕl. s. A plant.

HOGSHEAD, hôgs'hĕd. s. A measure of liquids containing sixty-three gallons; any large barrel.

☞ This word is sometimes pronounced as if written hog-shed: if Dr. Johnson's derivation of this word from hog and head be a true one, this pronunciation is certainly wrong, and arises from the junction of the letters s and h in printing, which may be presumed to have occasioned a similar mispronunciation in household and falsehood, which see. Junius derives this word from the Belgic Ockshood, oghshood, or hocksboot. Minshew, says Skinner, derives it from Ockshood and Ogshood; but he himself is of opinion that it rather comes from the Latin Orca, a great seafish, an enemy to the whale, and the Belgic hoofd, as much as to say, Ork's hoofd; that is, Orcæ caput, an Ork's head.

HONOUR, ŏn'nŭr. s. (394). Dignity; reputation; the title of a man of rank; nobleness; reverence, due veneration; chastity; glory, boast; publick mark of respect; privileges of rank or birth; civilities paid; ornament, decoration.

☞ This word, and its companion favour, the two servile attendants on cards and notes of fashion, have so generally dropped the u, that to spell these words with that letter is looked upon as gauche and rustic in the extreme. In vain did Dr. Johnson enter his protest against the innovation; in vain did he tell us, that the sound of the word required the u, as well as its derivation from the Latin through the French: the sentence seems to have been passed, and we now hardly ever find these words with this vowel but in our Dictionaries. But though I am a declared enemy to all needless innovation, I see no inconvenience in spelling these words in the fashionable manner; there is no reason for preserving the u in honour and favour, that does not hold good for the preservation of the same letter in errour, authour, and a hundred others: and with respect to the pronunciation of these words without the u, while we have so many words where the o sounds u, even when the accent is on it, as honey, money, &c. we need not be in much pain for the sound of u in words of this termination, where the final r brings all the unaccented vowels to the same level; that is, to the short sound of u.—See Principles, No. 418.

Horde, hŏrde. s. A clan, a migratory crew of people; a body of Tartars.

Horizon, hō-rī'zŏn. s. (503). The line that terminates the view.

☞ This word was, till of late years, universally pronounced, in prose, with the accent on the first syllable; and Shakespeare, says Dr. Johnson, has improperly placed it so in verse:

.....“ When the morning sun shall raise his car
“ Above the borders of this horizon,
“ We'll forwards towards Warwick and his mates.”

With respect to the propriety of this pronunciation it may be observed, that there is scarcely any thing more agreeable to the genuine analogy of English orthoëpy, than placing the accent on the first syllable of a trisyllable, when the middle syllable does not end with a consonant. (503). But another rule almost as constantly counteracts this analogy: when the word is perfectly Latin or Greek, and the accent is on the penultimate, then we generally follow the accentuation of those languages. Poets have so universally placed the accent on the second syllable of this word, and this pronunciation has so classical an air as to render the other accentuation vulgar.

Horizontal, hŏr-ē-zŏn'tăl. a. Near the horizon; parallel to the horizon, on a level.

Horizontally, hŏr-ē-zŏn'tăl-ē. ad. In a direction parallel to the horizon.

HYMENEAN, hi-mė-nė'ăn. } marriage song.

HYMENEAL, hi-mė-nė'ăl. } a. Pertaining to marriage.
HYMENEAN, hi-mė-nė'ăn. }

☞ In these compounds of Hymen, Mr. Sheridan has shortened the i in the first syllable; but though I think this tendency of the secondary accent to shorten the vowel perfectly agreeable to analogy, yet y has so frequently the sound of the long i that it seems, in this case and some others, to counteract that tendency, nor can any other reason be given why the same letter in hyperbolical and hypercritic should be long as Mr. Sheridan has properly marked them. Dr. Kenrick, Mr. Buchanan, and Mr. Perry, by their notation, seem of the same opinion.

HYMN, him. s. An encomiastick song, or song of adoration to some superior being.

To HYMN, him. v. a. To praise in song, to worship with hymns.

To HYMN, him. v. n. To sing songs of adoration.

HYPALLAGE, hi-păl'lă-jė. s. A figure by which words change their cases with each other.

HYPER, hi'pŭr. s. Injudiciously used by Prior for a hypercritick.

HYPERBOLA, hi-pėr'bŏ-lă. s. (187). A term in mathematicks.

HYPERBOLE, hi-pėr'bŏ-lė s. (187). A figure in rhetorick by which any thing is increased or diminished beyond the exact truth.

☞ None of our orthöepists but Dr. Johnson accent this word on the first syllable; and that he should do so is the more surprising, as all his poetical authorities adopt a different pronunciation:

"Hyperboles, so daring and so bold,
"Disdaining bounds, are yet by rules con-
"troll'd." Granville.

HYPERBOLICAL, hi-pėr-bŏl'ė-kăl. } a.
HYPERBOLICK, hi-pėr-bŏl'ik. }
Belonging to the hyperbola; exaggerating or extenuating beyond fact.

HYPERBOLICALLY, hi-pėr-bŏl'ė-kăl-lė. ad. (509). In form of a hyperbole; with exaggeration or extenuation.

HYPOCRITICALLY, hĭp-pō-krĭt'ĭk-kăl-ē. ad. With dissimulation, without sincerity.

HYPOGASTRICK, hĭp-ō-găs'trĭk. a. Seated in the lower part of the belly.

HYPOGEUM, hĭp-ō-gē'ŭm. (512). A name which the ancient architects gave to cellars and vaults.

HYPOSTASIS, hī-pŏs'tă-sĭs. s. (187). Distinct substance; personality, a term used in the doctrine of the Holy Trinity.

HYPOSTATICAL, hī-pō-stăt'ē-kăl. a. Constitutive, constituent as distinct ingredients; personal, distinctly personal.

HYPOTENUSE, hī-pŏt'ē-nūse. s. (187). The line that subtends the right angle of a right-angled triangle, the subtense.

☞ Mr. Sheridan and Dr. Ash accent this word on the second syllable; but Dr. Johnson, Dr. Kenrick, Mr. Barclay, Bailey, and Buchanan, on the last. These authorities induced me, in the first edition of this Dictionary, to place the accent on the last syllable; but, upon farther inquiry, I found the best usage decidedly in favour of the antepenultimate accent; and as the secondary accent is on the second syllable of the Latin Hypotenusa, this accentuation seems most agreeable to analogy.—See ACADEMY and INCOMPARABLE.

HYPOTHESIS, hĭp-pŏth'ē-sĭs, or hī-pŏth'ē-sĭs. s. (187). A supposition, a system formed under some principle not proved.

HYPOTHETICAL, hī-pō-*th*ĕt'tē-kăl. (187). } a.
HYPOTHETICK, hī-pō-*th*ĕt'tĭk. }
(187). Including a supposition, conditional.

HYPOTHETICALLY, hī-pō-*th*ĕt'tē-kăl-ē. ad. (187). Upon supposition, conditionally.

HYSSOP, hĭz'zŭp, or hī'sŭp. s. A plant. It hath been a great dispute, whether the hyssop commonly known is the same which is mentioned in Scripture.

☞ Mr. Sheridan, Mr. Scott, Mr. Entick, W. Johnston, and Buchanan, pronounce this word in the second manner; Dr. Kenrick, Dr. Ash, and Mr. Perry, in the first. To pronounce the y long before double s is contrary to every rule in spelling; and therefore if the first mode be not the best, the orthography ought necessarily to be changed.

HYSTERICAL, hĭs-tĕr'rē-kăl. } a.
HYSTERICK, hĭs-tĕr'rĭk. (509). }
Troubled with fits, disordered in the regions of the womb; proceeding from disorders in the womb.

HYSTERICKS, hĭs-tĕr'rĭks. s. Fits of women, supposed to proceed from disorders in the womb.

I.

I, i. Pron. personal. Oblique case ME, Plural WE; Oblique case US. The pronoun of the first person, Myself; I is more than once, in Shakespeare, (and Dr. Johnson might have added, very often in Beaumont and Fletcher,) written for ay or yes.—See Principles, No. 8, 105, 185.

☞ It may be remarked, that the frequent use of this letter in our old dramatic writers instead of Ay, is a proof that our ancestors pronounced I much broader than we do at present, and somewhat approaching to the sound it has at this day in the north of England.—See Directions to Foreigners prefixed to this Dictionary.

To JABBER, jăb'bŭr. v. n. (98). To talk idly, without thinking, to chatter.

JABBERER, jăb'bŭr-ŭr. s. One who talks inarticulately or unintelligibly.

JACENT, jā'sĕnt. ad. Lying at length.

IACINTH, ī'ă-sĭn*th*. s. The same with hyacinth; a precious stone.

JACK, jăk. s. The diminutive of John; the name of instruments which supply the place of a boy, as an instrument to pull off boots; an engine which turns the spit; a young pike; a cup of waxed leather; a small bowl thrown out for a mark to the bowlers; a part of the musical instrument called a virginal; the male of some animals; a support to saw wood on; the colours or ensign of a ship; a cunning fellow.

JACK-BOOTS, jăk-bōōts'. s. Boots which serve as armour.

JACK-PUDDING, jăk-pŭd'dĭng. s. A zany, a merry-andrew.

JACKALENT, jăk-ă-lĕnt'. s. A simple sheepish fellow.

JACKAL, jăk-kăll'. s. (406). A small animal supposed to start prey for the lion.

☞ Mr. Nares, who is an excellent judge both of analogy and usage, says, the accentuation of this word upon the last syllable is adopted by Dr. Johnson; but it is certainly now obsolete. I am reluctantly of a different opinion, and think Dryden's accentuation the best:

"Close by their fire-ships like Jackalls ap"pear,
"Who on their lions for their prey at"tend."

JACKANAPES, jăk'ăn-ăps. s. A monkey, an ape; a coxcomb, an impertinent.

JACKDAW, jăk-dăw'. s. A small species of crow.

JACKET, jăk'kĭt. s. (99). A short coat, a close waistcoat.

JACOBINE, jăk'ō-bĭn. s. (149). A pigeon with a high tuft; a monk of a particular order.

☞ In the first edition of this Dictionary I had marked the i in the last syllable of this word long. Since that time there has unfortunately been so much occasion to pronounce it, that no doubt is left of the sound of the last vowel.

JACTITATION, jăk-tĕ-tā'shŭn. s. Tossing, motion, restlessness.

JACULATION, jăk-ū-lā'shŭn. s. The act of throwing missile weapons.

JADE, jāde. s. A horse of no spirit, a hired horse, a worthless nag; a sorry woman.

JAILBIRD, jāle'bŭrd. s. One who has been in a jail.

JAILER, jā'lŭr. s. The keeper of a prison.

JAKES, jāks. s. A house of office, a privy.

JALAP, jăl'lŭp. s. A purgative root.

☞ The pronunciation of this word, as if written Jollop, which Mr. Sheridan has adopted, is, in my opinion, now confined to the illiterate and vulgar.

JAM, jăm. s. A conserve of fruits boiled with sugar and water.

JAMB, jăm. s. Any supporter on either side, as the posts of a door.

☞ This ought to have been added to the catalogue of words having the b silent. Principles, No. 347.

IAMBICK, ī-ăm'bĭk. s. Verses composed of a short and long syllable alternately.

To JANGLE, jăng'gl. v. n. (405). To quarrel, to bicker in words.

JANGLER, jăng'gl-ŭr. s. A wrangling, chattering, noisy fellow.

JANIZARY, jăn'nē-zăr-ē. s. One of the guards of the Turkish Sultan.

JANTY, jăn'tē. a. Showy, fluttering.

☞ It is highly probable, that, when this word was first adopted, it was pronounced as close to the French gentile as possible; but as we have no letter in our language equivalent to the French soft g; and as the nasal vowel en, when not followed by hard g, c, or k, is not to be pronounced by a mere English speaker, (see Encore,) it is no wonder that the word was anglicised in its sound, as well as in its orthography. Mr. Sheridan has preserved the French sound of the vowel in this word and its compound jauntiness, as is written jaunty and jauntiness; but Dr. Kenrick, Mr. Scott, and Mr. Perry, give the a the Italian sound, as heard in aunt, father, &c. and this, I imagine, it ought to have (214).

ILLITERACY, ĭl-lĭt'tĕr-ă-sē. s. Illiterateness, want of learning.

☞ I have adopted this word from the learned and ingenious Dr. Farmer, in his Essay on the Learning of Shakespeare, who, by his printing it in italics, seems to use it with timidity; but in nothing is the old English proverb, store is no sore, better verified than in words. Poetry will find employment for a thousand words not used in prose, and a nice discernment will scarcely find any words entirely useless that are not quite obsolete.

To IMPORT, ĭm-pōrt'. v. a. (492). To carry into any country from abroad; to imply, to infer; to produce in consequence; to be of moment.

IMPORT, ĭm'pōrt. s. Importance, moment, consequence; tendency; any thing imported from abroad.

☞ This substantive was formerly pronounced with the accent on the second syllable, but has of late years adopted the accent on the first, and classes with the general distinction of dissyllable, nouns and verbs of the same form. See Principles, No. 492.

IMPORTANCE, ĭm-pōr'tânse, or ĭm-pōr'tânse. s. Thing imported or implied; matter, subject; consequence, moment; importunity.

IMPORTANT, ĭm-pōr'tânt, or ĭm-pōr'tânt. a. Momentous, weighty, of great consequence.

☞ The second syllable of this and the foregoing word is frequently pronounced as in the verb to import. The best usage, however, is on the side of the first pronunciation, which seems to suppose that it is not a word formed from import, but an adoption of the French importance, and therefore it ought not to be pronounced as a compound, but as a simple. The authorities for this pronunciation are, Mr. Sheridan, Dr. Kenrick, Dr. Ash, W. Johnston, Mr. Perry, and Mr. Buchanan. Mr. Scott is for either, but gives the first the preference.

IMPORTATION, ĭm-pōr-tā'shŭn. s. The act or practice of importing, or bringing into a country from abroad.

IMPORTER, ĭm-pōrt'ŭr. s. (98). One that brings in any thing from abroad.

IMPRACTICABILITY, ĭm-prăk'tĕ-kă-bĭl'ĕ-tĕ. s. Impossibility, the state of being not feasible.

☞ This word is not in Johnson, but I insert it on his own authority: for though it is not in his Vocabulary, he has used it to explain the word impossibility. But the very current use of this word would be a sufficient authority for it, as its synonym Impracticableness, from the necessity of placing the accent high, is so difficult of pronunciation, and so inferior in sound, as to leave no doubt to which we should give the preference.

IMPRACTICABLE, ĭm-prăk'tĕ-kă-bl. a. Not to be performed, unfeasible, impossible; untractable, unmanageable.

IMPRACTICABLENESS, ĭm-prăk'tĕ-kă-bl-nĕs. s. Impossibility.

To IMPRECATE, ĭm'prĕ-kāte. v. a. To call for evil upon himself or others.

IMPRECATION, ĭm-prĕ-kā'shŭn. s. Curse, prayer by which any evil is wished.

IMPRECATORY, ĭm'prĕ-kă-tŭr-ĕ. a. Containing wishes of evil.

☞ I have differed from Mr. Sheridan in the accentuation of this word. He places the accent on the second syllable; but Dr. Johnson, Dr. Ash, and Mr. Scott, on the first. He himself places the accent on the first of Deprecatory; and the same reason holds in both.—See Principles, No. 512.

To IMPREGN, ĭm-prēne'. v. a. (386). To fill with young, to fill with any matter or quality.

IMPREGNABLE, ĭm-prĕg'nă-bl. a. Not to be stormed, not to be taken; unshaken, unmoved, unaffected.

Shamelessness, immodesty.

IMPUDENT, im'pū-dĕnt. a. (503). Shameless, wanting modesty.

IMPUDENTLY, im'pū-dĕnt-lē. ad. Shamelessly, without modesty.

To IMPUGN, im-pūne'. v. a. (386). To attack, to assault.

☞ Notwithstanding the clear analogy there is for pronouncing this word in the manner it is marked, there is a repugnance at leaving out the g, which nothing but frequent use will take away. If sign were in as little use as impugn, we should feel the same repugnance at pronouncing it in the manner we do. But as language is association, no wonder association should have such power over it.—For the analogies that lead us to this pronunciation, see Principles, No. 385.

Mr. Sheridan, Mr. Nares, and Mr. Scott, pronounce the word as I have marked it; that is, with the g silent, and the u long; but Dr. Kenrick, Mr. Perry, and Buchanan, though they suppress the g, pronounce the u short. That this short sound is contrary to analogy cannot be doubted, when we take a view of the words of this termination; and the only plea for it is, the short sound of the vowels before gm in phlegm, diaphragm, paraphgm, epophthegm, and paradigm, (389): but as the accent is not on any of these syllables, except phlegm, which is irregular, (508,) it is no wonder the vowel should shorten in these words as it so frequently does in the numerous terminations in ile, ine, ite, &c. (147)

IMPUGNER, im-pū'nŭr. s. One that attacks or invades.

☞ In judging of the propriety of this pronunciation, we must not confound the participles impugning, impugned, and the verbal noun impugner, with such words as we do not form ourselves, as repugnant, malignant, &c. The former are mere branches of the verb impugn, and therefore make no alteration in the root; the latter we receive already formed from the Latin or the French, and pronounce the g as we do in signify and signet, though it is silent in signed, signing, or signer. For it must be carefully observed, that the analogy of pronunciation admits of no alteration in the sound of the verb, upon its being formed into a participle or verbal noun; nor in the sound of the adjective, upon its acquiring a comparative or superlative termination.—See Principles, No. 400.

IMPUISSANCE, im-pū-ĭs'sânse. s. Impotence, inability, weakness, feebleness.—See PUISSANCE.

IMPULSE, im'pŭlse. s. Communicated force, the effect of one body acting upon another; influence acting upon the mind, motion, idea.

INACTIVITY, ĭn-ăk-tĭv'ĕ-tĕ. s. Idleness, rest, sluggishness.

INADEQUACY, ĭn-ăd'ĕ-kwă-sĕ. s. The state of being unequal to some purpose.

☞ The frequent use of this word in Parliament, and its being adopted by some good writers, made me esteem it not unworthy of a place here; though I have not met with it in any other Dictionary. The word inadequateness, which is equivalent to it, is not in Johnson; but there seems a repugnance in writers and speakers to abstracts formed by ness; if it is possible to find one of another termination: and to this repugnance we owe the currency of this word.

INADEQUATE, ĭn-ăd'ĕ-kwate. a. (91). Not equal to the purpose, defective.

INADEQUATELY, ĭn-ăd'ĕ-kwate-lĕ. ad. Defectively, not completely.

☞ I have not met with this word in any Dictionary, and have often regretted being obliged to use the word incendiary as an adjective; but meeting with incendious in Lord Bacon, where, speaking of rebellion, he says, "Because of the infinite "evils which it brings on princes and their "subjects, it is represented by the horrid "image of Typhoeus, whose hundred heads "are the divided powers, and flourishing "jaws incendious designs," I thought I should do a real service to the language by inserting this word.

INCENDIARY, ĭn-sĕn'dė-ā-rė, or ĭn-sĕn'jė-ā-rė. s. (293) (376). One who sets houses or towns on fire in malice or for robbery; one who inflames faction, or promotes quarrels.

Inclinatory, ĭn-klĭn'ā-tŭr-ē. a. Having a quality of inclining to one or other.

☞ I have differed from Mr. Sheridan in the quantity of the vowel in the second syllable of this word, as well as in Declinatory. My reason is, that the termination atory has a tendency to shorten the preceding vowel, as is evident in Declamatory, Predatory, &c. which have the vowel in the second syllable short, though it is long in the Latin words from which these are derived.

Inclinatorily, ĭn-klĭn'ā-tŭr-rē-lē. ad. Obliquely, with inclination to one side or the other.

To Incline, ĭn-klīne'. v. n. To bend, to lean, to tend towards any part; to be favourably disposed to, to feel desire beginning.

INCOMPARABLE, in-kôm'pâ-râ-bl. a. Excellent above compare, excellent beyond all conception.

☞ This is among some of the words in our own language, whose accentuation astonishes foreigners, and sometimes puzzles natives. What can be the reason, say they, that comparable and incomparable have not the same accent as the verb compare. To which it may be answered: One reason is, that the English are fond of appearing in the borrowed robes of other languages; and as comparable and incomparable may possibly be derived from comparabilis and incomparabilis, they seem desirous of laying the stress on the first syllable, both to show their affinity to the Latin words (see Academy), and to distinguish them from the homespun words formed from our own verb. When this distinction is once adopted, the mind, which is always labouring to express its ideas distinctly and forcibly, finds a sort of propriety in annexing different ideas to the different accentuation; and thus the distinction becomes accurate and classical. If we may compare small things with great, it may be observed, that the evils of language, like other evils in nature, produce some good. But it may be likewise observed, that producing different meanings by a different accentuation of words, is but a bungling way of promoting the copiousness of languages, and ought as much as possible to be discouraged; especially when it adds to the difficulty, and takes away from the harmony of pronunciation. Besides, there is a petty criticism which always induces coxcombs in pronunciation to carry these distinctions farther than they ought to go. Not content with accenting acceptable, admirable, commendable, comparable, lamentable, &c. on the first syllable, which implies not a mere capacity of being accepted, admired, &c. but a worthiness of being accepted, admired &c.: corruptible and susceptible are sometimes accented in this manner, without the least necessity from a difference of signification. In short, all these refinements in language, which are difficult to be understood, and productive of perplexity, ought to be considered rather as evils than advantages, and to be restrained within as narrow bounds as possible.—See BOWL.

INCOMPARABLY, in-kôm'pâ-râ-blè. ad. Beyond comparison, without competition; excellently, to the highest degree.

INCOMPASSIONATE, in-kôm-pâsh'ûn-âte. a. (91). Void of pity.

INDECOROUS, in-dē-kō'rŭs, or in-dĕk'ō-rŭs. a. Indecent, unbecoming.—See DECOROUS.

☞ Nothing can show more with what servility we sometimes follow the Latin accentuation than pronouncing this word with the accent on the penultimate. In the Latin decorous the o is long, and therefore has the accent; but in dedecorous the o is short, and the accent is consequently removed to the antepenultimate; this alteration of accent obtains likewise when the word is used in English, and this accentuation is perfectly agreeable to our own analogy: but because the Latin adjective indecorus has the penultimate long, and consequently the accent on it, we must desert our own analogy, and servilely follow the Latin accentuation, though that accentuation has no regard to analogy; for why dedecorous and indecorous, words which have a similar derivation and meaning, should have the penultimate of different quantities, can be resolved into nothing but the caprice of custom; but that so clear an analogy of our own language should be subservient to the capricious usages of the Latin, is a satire upon the good sense and taste of Englishmen. Dr. Ash is the only one who places the accent on the antepenultimate of this word: but what is his single authority, though with analogy on his side, to a crowd of coxcombs flirting with scraps of Latin?—See Principles, No. 512.

INDECORUM, in-dē-kō'rŭm. s. Indecency, something unbecoming.

(559).—Fāte, fār, fall, făt;—mē, mĕt;—pine, pĭn;—

☞ This word is nearly under the same predicament as Disputable. Dr. Johnson, Dr. Ash, Dr. Kenrick, W. Johnston, Mr. Smith, Buchanan and Bailey, adopt the last accentuation, and only Mr. Sheridan and Entick the first; and yet my experience and recollection grossly fail me, if this is not the general pronunciation of polite and lettered speakers. Mr. Scott has given both pronunciations; but, by placing this the first, seems to give it the preference.—See DISPUTABLE.

INDISPUTABLENESS, ĭn-dĭs'pū-tā-bl-nĕs. s. The state of being indisputable, certainty.

INDISPUTABLY, ĭn-dĭs'pū-tā-blē. ad. Without controversy, certainly; without opposition.

INDISSOLVABLE, ĭn-dĭz-zŏl'vā-bl. a. Indissoluble, not separable as to its parts; not to be broken, binding for ever.

☞ For the orthography of this word, see DISSOLVIBLE.

INDISSOLUBILITY, ĭn-dĭs-sŏ-lū-bĭl'ĕ-tē. s. Resistance of a dissolving power, firmness, stableness.

INDISSOLUBLE, ĭn-dĭs'sŏ-lū-bl. a. Resisting all separation of its parts, firm, stable; binding for ever, subsisting for ever.—See DISSOLUBLE.

INDISSOLUBLENESS, ĭn-dĭs'sŏ-lū-bl-nĕs. s. Indissolubility, resistance to separation of parts.

INDISSOLUBLY, ĭn-dĭs'sŏ-lū-blē. ad. In a manner resisting all separation; for ever, obligatorily.

INDISTINCT, ĭn-dĭs-tĭnkt'. a. Not plainly marked, confused; not exactly discerning.

INDISTINCTION, ĭn-dĭs-tĭnk'shŭn. s. Confusion, uncertainty; omission of discrimination.

INDISTINCTLY, ĭn-dĭs-tĭnkt'lē. ad. Confusedly, uncertainly; without being distinguished.

INDISTINCTNESS, ĭn-dĭs-tĭnkt'nĕs. s. Confusion, uncertainty.

INDISTURBANCE, ĭn-dĭs-tŭr'bânse. s. Calmness, freedom from disturbance.

INDIVIDUAL, ĭn-dē-vĭd'jū-ăl. s. A single being, as opposed to the species.

☞ It is somewhat strange that this word as a substantive should not have found its way into Johnson's Dictionary, but not in the least strange that Mr. Sheridan and Dr. Kenrick should omit it.

INDIVIDUAL, ĭn-dē-vĭd'ū-ăl, or ĭn-dē-vĭd'jū-ăl. a. (463). Separate from others or the same species, single, numerically one; undivided, not to be parted or disjoined.

☞ The tendency of d to go into j, when the accent is before, and u after it, is evident in this and the succeeding words.—See Principles, No. 293, 294, 376.

INDIVIDUALITY, ĭn-dē-vĭd-ū-ăl'ĕ-tē. s. Separate or distinct existence.

INDIVIDUALLY, ĭn-dē-vĭd'ū-ăl-ē. ad. With separate or distinct existence, numerically.

To INDIVIDUATE, ĭn-dē-vĭd'ū-āte. v. a. To distinguish from others of the same species, to make single.

INDIVIDUATION, ĭn-dē-vĭd-ū-ā'shŭn. s. That which makes an individual.

INDIVIDUITY, ĭn-dē-vĭd-ū'ĕ-tē. s. The state of being an individual, separate existence.

INDIVISIBILITY, ĭn-dē-vĭz-ĕ-bĭl'ĕ-tē. (552).

INDIVISIBLENESS, ĭn-dē-vĭz'ĕ-bl-nĕs. } s. State in which no more division can be made.

INDIVISIBLE, ĭn-dē-vĭz'ĕ-bl. a. What cannot be broken into parts, so small as that it cannot be smaller.

INDIVISIBLY, ĭn-dē-vĭz'ĕ-blē. ad. So as it cannot be divided.

INDOCIBLE, ĭn-dŏs'ĕ-bl. a. (405). Unteachable, insusceptible of instruction.

INDOCIL, ĭn-dŏs'ĭl. a. Unteachable, incapable of being instructed.

☞ This word and all its relatives have the o so differently pronounced by our best orthoëpists, that the shortest way to shew the difference will be to exhibit them at one view:

Dŏcile. Sheridan, Scott, Buchanan, W. Johnston, Entick, Nares, Smith.
Dōcile. Kenrick, Perry.
Indŏcile. Sheridan, Scott, Buchanan, W. Johnston, Perry, Entick.
Indōcile.
Dŏcible. Sheridan, Scott, Entick.
Dōcible. Kenrick, Perry.
Indŏcible. Sheridan, Scott, Buchanan, W. Johnston, Entick.
Indōcible. Perry.

We here see the great preponderance of authority for the short sound of o in all these words of three syllables, not because this letter is short in the Latin words whence they are derived; for risible and visible, which have the i short with us, are risibilis and visibilis in Latin; but because the accent in our English word is antepenultimate, and because this accent has a shortening power in all words of this form, which may be called simples (503), unless the antepenultimate vowel be a, and then it is always long, (509) (511) (527). Thus the antepenultimate vowels in credible, clavicle, vesicle, &c. are short, though derived from credibilis, clavicula, vesicula, &c.; but the a in tamable, debatable, &c. is long, because they are formatives of our own, from tame, debate, &c.

Why Dr Johnson should spell this word without the final e, as we see it in the first and last editions of his Dictionary, cannot be conceived. As well might he have left this letter out in puerile, versatile, and fertile. In this he seems implicitly to have followed the authority of Dr. Bently, who, however versed in Latin and Greek, has been proved by Dr. Lowth not to be infallible in the Grammar of his own language.

INIMICAL, ĭn-ĭm'ĕ-kăl, or ĭn-ĕ-mĭ'kăl. a. Hostile, contrary, repugnant.

☞ This word sprung up in the House of Commons about ten years ago, and has since been so much in use as to make us wonder how we did so long without it. It had, indeed, one great recommendation, which was, that it was pronounced in direct opposition to the rules of our own language. An Englishman, who had never heard it pronounced, would, at first sight, have placed the accent on the antepenultimate, and have pronounced the penultimate i short; but the vanity of showing its derivation from the Latin inimicus, where the penultimate i is long; and the very oddity of pronouncing this i long in inimical made this pronunciation fashionable. I know it may be urged, that this word, with respect to sound, was as great an oddity in the Latin language as it is in ours; and that the reason for making the i long was its derivation from amicus. It will be said too, that, in other words, such as aromaticus, tyrannicus, rhetoricus, &c. the i was only terminational; but in inimicus it was radical, and therefore entitled to the quantity of its original amicus. In answer to this, it may be observed, that this was no reason for placing the accent on that syllable in Latin. In that language, whenever the penultimate syllable was long, whether radical or terminational, it had always the accent on it. Thus the numerous terminations in alis and ator, by having the penultimate a long, had always the accent on that letter, while the i in the termination ilis and itas seldom had the accent, because that vowel was generally short. But allowing for a moment that we ought servilely to follow the Latin accent and quantity in words which we derive from that language; this rule, at least, ought to be restricted to such words as have preserved their Latin form, as orator, senator, character, &c. yet in these words we find the Latin penultimate accent entirely neglected, and the English antepenultimate adopted. But if this Latin accent and quantity should extend to words from the Latin that are anglicised, then we ought to pronounce divinity, devĭne-e-ty; severity, se-vĕre-e-ty; and urbanity, ur-băne-e-ty. In short, the whole language would be metamorphosed, and we should neither pronounce English nor Latin, but a Babylonish dialect between both.

INTERCALAR, in-tĕr'kă-lăr. } a.
INTERCALARY, in-tĕr-kăl'ă-ré. }
Inserted out of the common order to preserve the equation of time, as the twenty-ninth of February in a leap-year is an Intercalary day.

☞ All our orthoepists agree in placing the accent on the second syllable of intercalar and intercalate; and Mr. Sheridan, Dr. Ash, Mr. Perry, Buchanan, Barclay, and Entick, place it on the same syllable in intercalary; but Dr. Kenrick, W. Johnston, and Bailey, on the third. This latter pronunciation is certainly more agreeable to the ear; and as it is derived from the Latin intercalaris, a word of the same number of syllables with the penultimate long, it should seem we ought to place the accent on the same syllable on the English word (503); but as our language absolutely forbids us to lay the stress on the a in this termination (512), I see no reason why we should not place it on the preceding syllable, especially as the termination is not enclitical (513), and therefore does not require the accent on the conjunctive part of the word (see ACADEMY). The accent on the third syllable therefore, as it clashes with no analogy, and is so much more agreeable to the ear, ought, in my opinion, to be adopted.

To INTERCALATE, in-tĕr'kă-lăte. v. a. To insert an extraordinary day.

INTERCALATION, in-tĕr-kă-lă'shŭn. s. Insertion of days out of the ordinary reckoning.

INTERFERENCE, ĭn-tĕr-fē-rĕnse. s. An interposing, an intermeddling.

☞ There is a perfectly new pronunciation of this word, by placing the accent on the second syllable, which, from its singularity, bids fair for a reception among the minor critics in pronunciation, especially when there are at first sight a few plausible analogies in its favour. Why, these critics will say, should we not pronounce this word with the accent on the antepenultimate syllable, as well as conference, deference, preference, influence, and circumference, which it is evident are not formed from our verbs to confer, defer, &c. but from the Latin conferens, deferens, &c.? It may be answered that as there is no Latin verb interfero, there is not the same reason for accenting this word on the antepenultimate syllable, as there is for the other words: and therefore forming interference from our own verb to interfere, seems preferable to the forming of a mungrel Latin word merely to avoid a formative of our own; especially when we have so many words in a similar termination deriving their accent from the verb: as defiance, from defy; reliance, from rely; assurance, from assure, &c.; and even in this termination condolence, from condole; and why not interference from interfere? Entick's is the only Dictionary in which I have found this very common and useful word; but as Dr. Johnson has not got it, this omission is easily accounted for.

☞ Mr. Sheridan, Dr. Kenrick, Mr. Nares, Buchanan, W. Johnston, Mr. Perry and Mr. Barclay, place the accent on the second syllable of this word; and Dr. Johnson, Dr. Ash, Mr. Scott, Bailey, & Entick, on the first. I do not hesitate a moment to pronounce this the best accentuation: for as this word must be derived from the noun interstitium, and not from the verb intersto, the rule so often mentioned of changing the secondary accent of the Latin word when shortened into the principal accent of the English word must take place here.—See ACADEMY and INCOMPARABLE.

It is not easy to conjecture what could be the reason why this majority of orthŏepists should be found on the side of the penultimate pronunciation of this word. It is certain that the greatest part do but copy from former Dictionaries; but when an uncouth and uncommon pronunciation is adopted, it is generally for some learned reason from the dead languages, which the common inspector is utterly incapable of conceiving. In the present instance, however, there is not the shadow of a reason, from the original Latin, why we should place the accent on the second syllable of interstice, which would not oblige us to lay the stress on the same syllable of interfere, intervene, intercourse, interval, superflux, &c.

☞ This word is not in any Dictionary I have seen, but from its real utility ought to be in all of them. It is peculiarly expressive of that act of the mind which turns our thoughts upon ourselves; and is so happily exemplified by Hannah More, in her Strictures on Female Education, as at once to show the beauty of the thought and the propriety of the expression. Speaking of that exquisite sensibility which some females plead as a reason for shunning that distress, in the removing of which it should be exerted, she says, "That exquisite sense of feeling which God implanted in the heart as a stimulus to quicken us in relieving the miseries of others is thus introverted, and learns to consider self as not the agent, but the object of compassion. Tenderness is made an excuse for being hard-hearted; and instead of drying the weeping eyes of others, this false delicacy reserves its own selfish tears, for the more elegant and less expensive sorrows of the melting novel, or the pathetic tragedy." Vol. II. p. 128.

☞ Mr. Sheridan, Dr. Ash, Mr. Nares, Mr. Scott, W. Johnston, Mr. Perry, Buchanan, Entick, and Bailey, pronounce this word with the accent on the first syllable; and Dr. Johnson, Dr. Kenrick, and Mr. Barclay, on the second. Dr. Kenrick indeed tells us, that the accent is sometimes placed on the first; which is indeed very apparent from the number of writers I have produced for that accentuation. But the propriety of this pronunciation is not better supported by authority than by analogy. For if we have an English word from which a word of this kind might be formed, as declaratory, defamatory, &c. the accent will generally be found to be on the same syllable as in declare, defame, &c.; but if we have no such corresponding English word, and the word of this termination comes from the Latin, as promontory, desultory, &c. the word then takes the secondary accent we give the Latin words prŏmontŏrium, dĕsultŏrius, &c. Now though our English verb to invent comes from the same parent invenio as inventory, it is in so different a sense as to have no claim to the parentage. As therefore inventarium is the latter Latin word from which this word is derived, and as this has the secondary accent on the first syllable in our pronunciation of Latin, so inventory must have the principal accent in the same syllable in English.—See ACADEMY, INCOMPARABLE, &c.—Dr Johnson indeed furnishes us with an authority from Shakespeare against himself:

"I found
"Forsooth an inventory thus importing
"The several parcels of his plate."

☞ If we might judge by the uniformity we find in our Dictionaries, there would be no great difficulty in settling the accentuation of this word. Dr. Johnson, Dr. Ash, Dr. Kenrick, Bailey, Entick, W. Johnston, Perry, Barclay, and Buchanan, place the accent on the third syllable; Mr. Scott either on the second or third, with a preference to the latter; and Mr. Sheridan alone places it exclusively on the second. But notwithstanding Mr. Sheridan's accentuation stands single, I am much mistaken if it has not only the best usage on its side, but the clearest analogy to support it. It were, indeed to be wished, for the sake of harmony, that, like the Greeks and Romans, we had no accent higher than the antepenultimate; but language is the vox populi. Our accent, in a thousand instances, transgresses these classic bounds, and who shall confine it? In compounds of our own, with the utmost propriety, we place the accent on the fourth syllable from the last, as in wearisomeness, serviceableness, &c. (501); and a probable reason is given, under the word Academy, why we accent so many words from the Latin in the same manner; but be the reason what it will, certain it is that this custom has prevailed. This prevalence of custom is sufficiently exemplified in the positive of the word in question; Refragable is accented by Johnson, Ash and Bailey on the first syllable, and would probably have been accented in the same manner by the rest if they had inserted the word. Buchanan and Barclay, indeed, have the word, and accent it on the second; but their authority is greatly out-weighed by the three others. Convinced therefore, that pronouncing this word with the accent on the second syllable is following that path which the best usage has pointed out, I do not hesitate to dissent from so many authorities, especially when I find the best of these authorities inconsistent; for if we are to place the accent on the first syllabl of Refragable, why we should remove the accent in Irrefragable I cannot conceive.—See ACADEMY and DISPUTABLE.

IRREFUTABLE, ĭr-rĕ-fū'tâ-bl, a. Not to be overthrown by argument.

☞ All our Dictionaries place the accent on the third syllable of this word; nor do I mean to affront such respectable authority, by placing it on the second, as in irrefragable, though there is the same reason for both. Let it not be pleaded that we have the verb refute in favour of the first pronunciation; this has not the least influence on the words indisputable, irrevocable, incomparable, &c. The reason why Corruptible and Refractory ought not to have the accent on the first syllable, arises from the difficulty of pronouncing the uncombinable consonants pt and ct in the syllables not under the stress.—See Principles, No. 517; also the words ACCEPTABLE and REFRACTORY.

IRREGULAR, ĭr-rĕg'gû-lâr. a. (88). Deviating from rule, custom, or nature; immethodical, not confined to any certain rule or order; not being according to the laws of virtue.

TO IRREGULATE, ĭr-rĕg'gû-lâte. v. a. To make irregular, to disorder.

IRRELATIVE, ĭr-rĕl'lâ-tĭv. a. Having no reference to any thing, single, unconnected.

IRRELEVANT, ĭr-rĕl'ĕ-vânt. a. Unassisting, unrelieving.

☞ This is one of the annual productions of the House of Commons (where new words and money bills naturally originate): but it certainly deserves reception, as it conveys a new idea, which is, that the object to which it relates is supposed to be in a fallen and abject state, and incapable of relief; whereas Unassisting may relate to an object which indeed wants assistance, but which is still in a militant state, and not overcome. Every new shade of thought, however nice, enriches a language, and may be considered as a real acquisition to it: but this word, as it is generally used in Parliament, seems to signify nothing more than merely unrelated; and if this had been expressed by irrelative, though not strictly classical, yet a very allowable formation, it would have been of real use; but as it is used at present, it is a pedantic encumbrance to the language.—See RELEVANT.)

IRRELIGION, ĭr-rĕ-lĭd'jŭn. s. Contempt of religion, impiety.

IRRELIGIOUS, ĭr-rĕ-lĭd'jŭs. a. (314). Contemning religion, impious; contrary to religion.

☞ (559).—Fāte, fâr, fâll, făt ;—mé, mĕt ;—pīne, pĭn ;—

IRREMOVEABLE, ĭr-rĕ-mōōv'ă-bl. a. Not to be moved, not to be changed.

IRRENOWNED, ĭr-rĕ-nōun'd'. a. (369). Void of honour.

IRREPARABLE, ĭr-rĕp'pă-ră-bl. a. Not to be recovered, not to be repaired.

☞ This word and its simple Reparable come from the Latin Reparabilis and Irreparabilis, and are pronounced with the accent on the preantepenultimate syllable, according to the analogy of words anglicised from the Latin, by dropping a syllable; which is, to place the accent on that syllable which had a secondary stress in our own English pronunciation of the Latin words.—See ACADEMY and INCOMPARABLE.

IRREPARABLY, ĭr-rĕp'pă-ră-blĕ. ad. Without recovery, without amends.

IRREPLEVIABLE, ĭr-rĕ-plēv'vĕ-ă-bl. a. Not to be redeemed. A law term.

IRREPREHENSIBLE, ĭr-rĕp-prĕ-hĕn'sĕ-bl. a. Exempt from blame.

IRREPROACHABLY, ĭr-rĕ-prōtsh'ă-blĕ. ad. Without blame, without reproach.

IRREPROVEABLE, ĭr-rĕ-prōōv'ă-bl. a. Not to be blamed, irreproachable.

IRREPTITIOUS, ĭr-rĕp'tĭsh-ŭs. a. Encroaching, creeping in.

☞ This word is in no Dictionary that I have met with; but it appears to me to deserve a place, as it is the only single word that expresses imperceptible intrusion. Mr. Elphinston seems to use it with precision, where he tells us, in his Principles of the English language, "that etymology counts the b in crumb irreptitious, "for not having found it in foreign sources, "she cannot see its use at home." Book 1. page 25.

IRRESISTIBILITY, ĭr-rĕ-zĭs-tĕ-bĭl'ĕ-tĕ. s. Power above opposition.

IRRESISTIBLE, ĭr-rĕ-zĭs'tĕ-bl. a. Superiour to opposition.

JUSTIFICATIVE, jŭs-tĭf'ē-kā-tĭv. a. Justifying; serving to justify or prove.

☞ I know not if I am excusable for inserting this word, which has not as yet found its way into any other Dictionary; but the frequency of seeing the French Pièces Justificatives seems to have familiarised it to our ears, and to invite us to the adoption of it. The distance of the accent from the end of the word can be no objection to an English speaker who has so many similar words, such as significative, purificative, &c.; and as we have no single word that will exactly stand in its place, it seems to have a better right to admission than many other words which are found no-where but in a Dictionary.—See Principles, No. 512.

JUSTIFICATOR, jŭs-tē-fē-kā'tŭr. s. (521). One who supports, defends, vindicates, or justifies.

To JUTTY, jŭt'té. v. a. To shoot out beyond.

JUVENILE, jū'vé-nil. a. (145). Young, youthful.

☞ Dr. Kenrick, Mr. Scott, and Mr. Perry, pronounce the i short in the last syllable of this word; and Mr. Sheridan, Mr. Buchanan, and W. Johnston, make it long. The former mode is, in my opinion, the more correct. If it should be urged that the i is long in the Latin Juvenīlis, it may be answered, that the same letter is long in the Latin Hostīlis, Servīlis, and Subtīlis, and yet the i in Hostile, Servile, and Subtile, is by Mr. Sheridan marked short.

JUVENILITY, jū-vé-nil'é-té. s. Youthfulness.

JUXTAPOSITION, jŭks-tă-pŏ-zĭsh'ŭn. s. Apposition, the state of being placed by each other.

☞ Scarcely any word has occasioned more altercation among verbal critics than this. A great appearance of propriety seems to favour the second pronunciation, till we observe a great number of similar words, where the long vowel in the simple is shortened in the compound, and then we perceive something like an idiom of pronunciation, which, to correct, would, in some measure, obstruct the current of the language. To preserve the simple without alteration in the compound, is certainly a desirable thing in language; but when the general tune of the language, as it may be called, crosses this analogy, we may depend on the rectitude of general custom, and ought to acquiesce in it. That the secondary accent shortens the vowel, which was long in the original, appears throughout the language in proclamation, provocation, &c. (530.) That the primary accent does the same in preface, prelate, prelude, &c. is evident; and as ledge is no general termination of our own, which is applicable to several words, why should we not consider knowledge as a simple, and pronounce it independently on its original quantity? The patrons for the first pronunciation are, Mr. Sheridan, Dr. Kenrick, Mr. Nares, Mr. Barclay, Mr. Elphinston, and Mr. Scott; and for the second, W. Johnston, and Mr. Buchanan. Mr. Perry gives both, but seems to allow the first the preference.—See Principles, No. 328, 515.

LAMBS-WOOL, lămz'wůl. s. Ale mixed with the pulp of roasted apples.

☞ Mr. Elphinston has a no less strange than whimsical derivation of this word from an old French substantive le moust, "That the verb must should ever have "been Scottishly man, (as, ye man doo'd, "for ye must do it,) seems indeed as surprising as that the old le moust (now "mout), the noun must should ever have "Englishly run into lamb's wool, which "beats far the change of Asparagus into "Sparrow-grass, or the elegant as elliptical "grass." Such a derivation, perhaps, is not impossible; but I should think the more natural, as well as the more easy one, is the resemblance of the soft pulp of an apple to the wool of a lamb.—See ASPARAGUS and the noun MUST.

LAMENTINE, lăm'mĕn-tine. s. (149). A fish called a sea-cow or manatee.

LAMINA, lăm'mĕ-nå. s. Thin plate, one coat laid over another.

☞ This word, from its derivation from the Latin, and its similar form to Stamina, may by some be mistaken for a plural, as Stamina is often for a singular; but it must be observed, that Lamina is a noun singular of the first declension, and that if we speak learnedly, we ought to form the plural by laminæ; but if we descend to plain English, it ought to be Laminas. —See ANIMALCULE and STAMINA.

LAMINATED, lăm'mĕ-nå-tĕd. a. Plated; used of such bodies whose contexture discovers such a disposition as that of plates lying over one another.

To LAMM, lăm. v. a. To beat soundly with a cudgel. A low word.

LANSQUENET, lăn'skĕn-nĕt. s. A common foot soldier; a game of cards.

☞ This word, as a game at cards, is altered by the vulgar into Lambskinnet. This is something, at least, which they understand; and this very intelligibility confirms them in the corruption.—See ASPARAGUS.

LANTERN, lăn'tŭrn. s. (98) (418). A transparent case for a candle; a light-house, a light hung out to guide ships.

☞ This word, says Dr. Johnson, by mistake is often written Lanthorn. The cause of this mistake is easy; transparent cases for candles were generally made of horn; and this was sufficient to persuade those who knew nothing of the derivation of the word from the Latin Lanterna, that this was its true etymology.—See ASPARAGUS.

To Leap, lēpe. v. n. (239). To jump, to move upward or progressively without change of the feet; to rush with vehemence; to bound, to spring; to fly, to start.

☞ The past time (367) of this verb is generally heard with the diphthong short; and if so, it ought to be spelled leapt, rhyming with kept. See Principles, No. 368. Dr. Kenrick, Mr. Scott, W. Johnston, Mr. Perry, Mr. Barclay, Mr. Nares, Mr. Smith, and Mr. Elphinston pronounce the diphthong in the present tense of this word long, as I have done; and Mr. Elphinston and Mr. Nares make it short in the preterit and participle. Mr. Sheridan alone makes the present tense short, which, if I recollect justly, is a pronunciation peculiar to Ireland.

To Leap, lēpe. v. a. To pass over or into by leaping; to compress, as beasts.

Leap, lēpe. s. Bound, jump, act of leaping; space passed by leaping; sudden transition; an assault of an animal of prey; embrace of animals.

Leap-frog, lēpe'frŏg. s. A play of children, in which they imitate the jump of frogs.

Leap-year, lēpe'yēre. s. Leap-year, or bissextile, is every fourth year, and so called from its leaping a day more that year than in a common year; so that the common year hath three hundred and sixty-five days, but the Leap-year three hundred and sixty-six; and then February hath twenty-nine days, which in common years hath but twenty-eight.

To Learn, lĕrn. v. a. (234). To gain the knowledge or skill of; to teach; improperly used in this last sense.

To Learn, lĕrn. v. n. To receive instruction; to improve by example.

Learned, lĕr'nĕd. a. (362). Versed in science and literature; skilled, skilful, knowing; skilled in scholastick knowledge.

Learnedly, lĕr'nĕd-lē. ad. With knowledge, with skill.

Learning, lĕr'nĭng. s. (410). Literature, skill in languages or sciences; skill in any thing good or bad.

Learner, lĕr'nŭr. s. One who is yet in his rudiments.

Lease, lēse. s. (227). A contract by which, in consideration of some payment, a temporary possession is granted of houses or lands; any tenure.

To Lease, lēse. v. a. To let by lease.

To Lease, lēze. v. n. (227). To glean, to gather what the harvest-men leave.

Leaser, lē'zŭr. s. A gleaner.

Leash, lēēsh. s. (227). A leather thong, by which a falconer holds his hawk, or a courser leads his greyhound; a band wherewith to tie any thing in general.

To Leash, lēēsh. v. a. To bind, to hold in a string.

Leash, lēēsh. s. A brace and a half; a sportsman's term.

☞ Sportsmen, like the professors of other arts, often corrupt their technical terms; for we frequently hear this word pronounced like the lease of a house. This corruption, however, is not gone so far as to LECHERY, lĕtsh'ŭr-ē. s. (557). Lewdness, lust.

LECTION, lĕk-shŭn. s. A reading; a variety in copies.

LECTURE, lĕk'tshŭre. s. (461). A discourse pronounced upon any subject; the act or practice of reading, perusal; a magisterial reprimand.

To LECTURE, lĕk'tshŭre. v. a. To instruct formally; to instruct insolently and dogmatically.

LECTURER, lĕk'tshŭr-ŭr. s. An instructor, a teacher by way of lecture, a preacher in a church hired by the parish to assist the rector.

LECTURESHIP, lĕk'tshŭr-shĭp. s. The office of a lecturer.

LED, lĕd. Part. pret. of Lead.

LEDGE, lĕdje. s. A row, a layer, stratum; a ridge rising above the rest; any prominence or rising part.

LEDHORSE, lĕd'hŏrse. s. A sumpter horse.

LEE, lēē. s. Dregs, sediment, refuse. Sea term; it is generally that side which is opposite to the wind, as the Lee-shore is that the wind blows on.

LEE, lēē. a. Having the wind blowing on it; having the wind directed towards it.

LEECH, lēētsh. s. A physician, a professor of the art of healing; a kind of small water serpent, which fastens on animals, and sucks the blood.

LEGAL, lē'gâl. a. Done or conceived according to law; lawful, not contrary to law.

LEGALITY, lē-gâl'ē-tē. s. Lawfulness.

To LEGALIZE, lē'gâl-īze. v. a. To authorize; to make lawful.

LEGALLY, lē'gâl-lē. ad. Lawfully, according to law.

LEGATARY, lĕg'gâ-târ-ē. s. One who has a legacy left.

LEGATINE, lĕg'gâ-tine. a. (149). Made by a legate; belonging to a legate of the Roman see.

LEGATE, lĕg'gāte. s. (91). A deputy, an ambassador; a kind of spiritual ambassador from the Pope.

☞ Mr. Sheridan, Mr. Nares, Mr. Scott, Dr. Kenrick, and Mr. Perry, pronounce the first syllable of this word short, and Buchanan alone long.

LEGATEE, lĕg-gâ-tēē'. s. One who has a legacy left him.

LEGATION, lē-gā'shŭn. s. Deputation, commission, embassy.

LEGATOR, lĕg-gā-tōr'. s. (166). One who makes a will, and leaves legacies.

☞ This word seems to have the accent on the last syllable, the better to distinguish it from its correlative Legatee.

LEGEND, lē'jĕnd. s. A chronicle or register of the lives of saints; any memorial or relation; an incredible unauthentick narrative; any inscription, particularly on medals or coins.

☞ This word is sometimes pronounced with the vowel in the first syllable short, as if written lĕd-jend. This has the feeble plea of the Latin word Lego to produce; but with what propriety can we make this plea for a short vowel in English, when we pronounce that very vowel long in the Latin word we derive it from? The genuine and ancient analogy of our language, as Dr. Wallis observes, is, when a word of two syllables has the accent on the first, and the vowel is followed by a single consonant, to pronounce the vowel long. It is thus we pronounce all Latin words of this kind; and in this manner we should certainly have pronounced all our English words, if an affectation of following Latin quantity had not disturbed the natural progress of pronunciation. See DRAMA. But besides this analogy, the word in question has the authority of Mr. Sheridan, Mr. Scott, W. Johnston, Bailey, Entick, Perry, and Buchanan, on its side. Dr. Kenrick and Dr. Ash are the only abettors of the short sound.

LEGENDARY, lĕd'jĕn-dâ-rē. Pertaining to a legend.

☞ As the preceding word has, by the clearest analogy, the vowel in the first syllable long, so this word by having the accent higher than the antepenultimate, has as clear an analogy for having the same vowel short (530) (535). This analogy, however, is contradicted by Dr. Ash, W. Johnston, Mr. Scott, Entick, Buchanan, and Perry, who make the vowel e long, as in Legend. As Dr. Johnson's accentuation does not determine the quantity of the vowel, his not inserting this word is, in this case, no loss; but Mr. Sheridan's omission of it deprives us of a valuable opinion.

LEGER, lĕd'jŭr. s. (98). A leger-book, a book that lies in the compting-house.

LEGERDEMAIN, lĕd-jŭr-dē-mâne'. s. Sleight of hand, juggle, power of deceiving the eye by nimble motion, trick.

LEGERITY, lē-jĕr'ē-tē. s. Lightness, nimbleness.

LEGGED, lĕg'd. a. (359). Having legs.

LEGIBLE, lĕd'jē-bl. s. Such as may be read; apparent, discoverable.

LEGIBLY, lĕd'jē-blē. ad. In such a manner as may be read.

LEGION, lē'jŭn. s. A body of Roman soldiers, consisting of above five thousand; a military force; any great number.

LEGIONARY, lē'jŭn-ār-ē. a. Relating to a legion; containing a legion; containing a great indefinite number.

To LEGISLATE, lĕd'jĭs-lāte. v. a. To enact laws.

☞ This word is neither in Johnson nor Sheridan. For the pronunciation of the first syllable, see the following words:

LEGISLATION, lĕd-jĭs-lā'shŭn. s. The art of giving laws.

LEGISLATIVE, lĕd'jĭs-lā-tĭv. a. Giving laws, lawgiving.

LEGISLATOR, lĕd'jĭs-lā-tŭr. s. (166). A lawgiver, one who makes laws for any community.

LEGISLATURE, lĕd'jĭs-lā-tŭre. s. (461). The power that makes laws.

☞ Some respectable speakers in the House of Commons pronounce the e in the first syllable of this word long, as if written Leegislature, and think they are wonderfully correct in doing so, because the first syllable of all Latin words, compounded of Lex, is long. They do not know that, in pronouncing the word in this manner, they are contradicting one of the clearest analogies of the language; which is, that the antepenultimate, and secondary accent, shorten every vowel they fall upon except u, unless they are followed by a diphthong (534) (535). This analogy is evident in a numerous catalogue of words ending in ity, where the antepenultimate vowel is short in English, though long in the Latin words whence they are derived, as serenity, divinity, globosity, &c. The same may be observed of the words declamatory, deliberative, &c. where the two second syllables are short in English though long in the Latin declamatorius, deliberativus, &c. Even the words liberal and liberty, if pronounced with their first syllables long, as in the Latin words liberalis and libertas, ought to be sounded lye'beral and lye'berty. If, therefore, we consider the accent on the first syllable of legislator, legislature, or legislative, either as primary or secondary, we find a clear analogy for shortening the vowel; nor can we have the least reason for lengthening it, which will not oblige us in the same manner to lengthen the first vowel of lenitive, pedagogue, pacification, and a thousand others. See principles, No. 530, 535. Mr. Sheridan, Dr. Kenrick, Mr. Scott, and Mr. Perry, mark the e in the first syllable of this word and its relatives short. W. Johnston only marks them long. From Entick we can gather the quantity of this vowel in no word but legislate, where he makes it long; and Ash, Bailey, and Buchanan, do not mark it either way. These authorities sufficiently show us the general current of custom; and the analogies of the language sufficiently show the propriety of it.

LEGITIMACY, lĕ-jĭt'tĕ-mă-sĕ. s. Lawfulness of birth; genuineness, not spuriousness.

LEGITIMATE, lĕ-jĭt'tĕ-mâte. a. (91). Born in marriage, lawfully begotten.

To LEGITIMATE, lĕ-jĭt'tĕ'mâte. v. a. (91). To procure to any the right of legitimate birth; to make lawful.

LEGITIMATELY, lĕ-jĭt'ĕ-mâte-lĕ. ad. Lawfully, genuinely.

LEGITIMATION, lĕ-jĭt-ĕ-mă'shŭn. s. Lawful birth; the act of investing with the privileges of lawful birth.

LEGUME, lĕg'gûme. } s. (503).
LEGUMEN, lĕ-gû'mĕn. }
Seeds not reaped, but gathered by the hand, as, beans; in general, all larger seeds; pulse.—See BITUMEN and BLASPHEMOUS.

LEGUMINOUS, lĕ-gû'mĕ-nŭs. a. Belonging to pulse, consisting of pulse.

LEISURABLE, lĕ'zhûr-ă-bl. a. Done at leisure, not hurried, enjoying leisure.

LEISURABLY, lĕ'zhûr-ă-blĕ. ad. At leisure, without tumult or hurry.

LEISURE, lĕ'zhûre. s. (251). Freedom from business or hurry; vacancy of mind; convenience of time.

☞ Mr. Sheridan, Mr. Scott, Mr. Perry, Dr. Kenrick, and Mr. Smith, pronounce the diphthong in the word long; and Mr. Nares, Mr. Elphinston, and Mr. Barclay, short. The first manner is, in my opinion, preferable.

LEISURELY, lĕ'zhûr-lĕ. a. Not hasty, deliberate.

LEISURELY, lĕ'zhûr-lĕ. ad. Not in a hurry, slowly.

LEMMA, lĕm'mă. s. A proposition previously assumed.

LEMON, lĕm'mŭn. s. The fruit of the lemon-tree; the tree that bears lemons.

LEMONADE, lĕm-mŭn-âde'. s. Liquor made of water, sugar, and the juice of lemons.

LEONINE, lē'ō-nīne. a. (149). Belonging to a lion, having the nature of a lion. Leonine verses are those of which the end rhymes to the middle, so named from Leo the inventor.

LEOPARD, lĕp'pŭrd. s. (88). A spotted beast of prey.

LEPER, lĕp'pŭr. s. (98). One infected with a leprosy.

☞ All our orthöepists are uniform in pronouncing this word with the first syllable short, as in leprosy.

LEPEROUS, lĕp'pŭr-ŭs. a. Causing leprosy. Properly LEPROUS.

LEPORINE, lĕp'pō-rīne. a. Belonging to a hare, having the nature of a hare.

☞ Mr. Sheridan has marked the e in the first syllable of this word long, without even the flimsy plea of Latin quantity to support it. Mr. Perry, Entick, and Dr. Ash, are the only other orthöepists from whom we can gather the pronunciation of this letter. The two first are for the short sound, and the last for the long one. But the short sound is so agreeable to analogy, as to want no authorities to support it.—See Principles, No. 530, 535.

LEPROSY, lĕp'prō-sē. s. A loathsome distemper, which covers the body with a kind of white scales.

LEPROUS, lĕp'prŭs. a. (314). Infected with a leprosy.

LESS, lĕs. A negative or privative termination. Joined to a substantive, it implies the absence or privation of the thing; as, a witless man.

LESS, lĕs. s. A smaller quantity, a smaller degree.

LESS, lĕs. ad. In a smaller degree, in a lower degree.

LESSEE, lĕs-sēē'. s. The person to whom a lease is given.

To LESSEN, lĕs's'n. v. a. (103). To diminish in bulk; to diminish in degree of any quality; to degrade, to deprive of power or dignity.

To LESSEN, lĕs's'n. v. n. To grow less; to shrink.

LESSER, lĕs'sŭr. a. (98). A barbarous corruption of Less.

LESSON, lĕs's'n. s. (170). Any thing read or repeated to a teacher; precept, notion inculcated; portions of scripture read in divine service; tune pricked for an instrument; a rating lecture.

LESSOR, lĕs'sŏr. s. (166). One who lets any thing to farm, or otherwise, by lease.

LEST, lĕst, or lēst. conjunct. That not; for fear that.

☞ Almost all our orthöepists pronounce this word both ways; but the former seems to be by much the most general. This word is derived from the adjective least: but it is not uncommon for words to change their form when they change their class. Dr. Wallis's advice to spell the superlative of little lessest, has not yet been followed, and probably never will; and therefore there is no necessity for Dr. Lowth's expedient to distinguish these words by spelling the conjunction with a. But why we should sound the e long, contrary to the analogy of spelling, while such a pronunciation confounds the conjunction and the adjective, cannot be conceived.—The second pronunciation, therefore, ought to be exploded.

To Lout, lŏŏt. v. n. (312). To pay obeisance, to bow. Obsolete.

Loutish, lŏŏt'ĭsh. a. Clownish; bumpkinly.

Loutishly, lŏŏt'ĭsh-lē. ad. With the air of a clown, with the gait of a bumpkin.

Low, lō. a. (324). Not high; not rising far upwards; not elevated in situation; descending far downwards, deep; not swelling high, shallow, used of water; not of high price; not loud, not noisy; late in time, as the Lower empire; dejected, depressed; abject; dishonourable; not sublime, not exalted in thought or diction; reduced, in poor circumstances.

Low, lō. ad. Not aloft, not at a high price, meanly; in times near our own; with a depression of the voice; in a state of subjection.

To Low, lŏŏ, or lō. v. n. To bellow as a cow.

☞ Mr. Sheridan, Mr. Scott, Mr. Buchanan, W. Johnston, and Mr. Barclay, pronounce this word in the last manner; but Dr. Johnson, Dr. Kenrick, Mr. Nares, and Mr. Perry, in the first: and that this is the true pronunciation there is little doubt; not only as it is the more general sound of the diphthong (323), but as it is more expressive of the thing signified. The other sound is, in my opinion, a novelty, and ought to be exploded. Without laying much stress on Dryden's rhyme, it seems to confirm this opinion.

"Fair Iö graced his shield; but Iö now,
"With horns exalted stands, and seems to
"low."

Lowbell, lō'bĕl. s. A kind of fowling in the night, in which the birds are awakened by a bell, and lured by a flame.

To Lower, lō'ŭr. v. a. (98). To bring low, to bring down by way of submission; to suffer to sink down; to lessen, to make less in price or value.

To Lower, lō'ŭr. v. n. To grow less, to fall, to sink.

To Lower, lŏŏ'ŭr. v. n. (323). To appear dark, stormy, and gloomy, to be clouded; to frown, to pout, to look sullen.

☞ Whether this word comes from the Dutch loeren, to look askance, or from the English word lower, signifying to look low, as the sky seems to do when it is heavy and thick with clouds, (which is the much more probable derivation;) it certainly cries aloud for a different spelling from lower, to make low. For the reasons, see the words Flower and Flour; Bowl and Form.

Lower, lŏŏ'ŭr. s. Cloudiness, gloominess; cloudiness of look.

Loweringly, lŏŏr'ĭng-lē. ad. With cloudiness, gloomily.

MALE, māle. a. Of the sex that begets young, not female.

MALE, māle. s. The he of any species.

MALE, māle. In composition, signifies Ill.

MALEADMINISTRATION, māle-ăd-min-nis-trā'shŭn. s. Bad management of affairs.

☞ I have given the first syllable of this and the succeeding words, compounded of male, the long sound of a, because I look upon male as a prefix not alterable in its sound in words of our own composition, any more than arch, fore, mis, pre, or vice; arch and fore are used separately as adjectives, which is not the case with male; but mis, pre, and vice, are never used out of composition, and are therefore exactly under the same predicament. Dis not being a prefix of our own which we can apply to words at pleasure, alters the sound of s according to the presence or absence of the accent, or the nature of the accent, or the nature of the succeeding consonants (see DIS); but mis being applicable to any words, never alters the sound of s (426). Pre, when prefixed to words of our own, as pre-conceived, pre-supposed, &c. never shortens the vowel (530) (531) (532); and vice in vice-president, vice-admiral, &c. might as well be changed into vis-president, and vis-admiral, as malecontent and malepractice into malcontent and malpractice. But though all our Pronouncing Dictionaries adopt the short sound of a, and some even leave out the e, yet as analogy is so decidedly in favour of the long sound, and custom is not quite unanimous, the long sound ought certainly to have the preference with all who aim at correctness and consistency. W. Johnston is the only one who adopts this pronunciation; and Barclay, by putting a hyphen after male, seems to favour it. If custom has decided in favour of the short sound of a, the e ought to be omitted in writing, and then the spelling and sound would not be at variance; but as this would lead to incurable evils in language, the pronunciation ought rather to conform to the orthography.

MALECONTENT, māle'kŏn-tĕnt. s. } MALECONTENTED, māle-kŏn-tĕn'tĕd. a. } Discontented, dissatisfied.

MALECONTENTEDLY, māle-kŏn-tĕn'tĕd-lē. ad. With discontent.

MALIGNLY, mā-līne'lē. ad. Enviously, with ill-will.

MALKIN, mâw'kĭn. s. A dirty wench.

MALL, mâl. s. A stroke, a blow. Obsolete. A kind of beater or hammer; a walk where they formerly played with malls and balls.

☞ This word is a whimsical instance of the caprice of custom. Nothing can be more uniform than the sound we give to a before double l in the same syllable; and yet this word, when it signifies a wooden hammer, has not only changed its deep sound of a in all into the a in alley, but has dwindled into the short sound of e in Mall, a walk in St. James's Park, where they formerly played with malls and balls, and from whence it had its name; and to crown the absurdity, a street parallel to this walk is spelt Pall Mall, and pronounced Pellmell, which confounds its origin with the French adverb pêle mêle. For Bailey appears to derive the name of the street justly from pellere maleo, to strike with a mallet. That this word was justly pronounced formerly, we can scarcely doubt, from the rhymes to it:

"————With mighty mall
"The monster merciless him made to fall."
Spencer.

"And give that reverend head a mall
"Or two or three against a wall."
Hudibras.

As a corroboration of this, we find a large wooden club used for killing swine, called and spelt a mall; and the verb signifying to beat or bruise is spelt and pronounced in the same manner. The word mallet, where the latter l is separated from the former, is under a different predicament, and is pronounced regularly.—See Principles, No. 85.

MALLARD, măl'lărd. s. (88). The drake of the wild duck.

MALLEABILITY, măl-lē-ă-bĭl'ē-tē. s. Quality of enduring the hammer.

MANKILLER, măn'kĭl-ŭr. s. (98). Murderer.

MANKIND, măn-kīnd'. s. The race or species of human beings.—See GUARD.

☞ This word is sometimes improperly pronounced with the accent on the first syllable, and is even marked so by Dr. Ash. Milton, with his usual license, sometimes places the accent in this manner——

"——where he might likeliest find
"The only two of mankind, but in them
"The whole included race his purpos'd prey."

But Pope, in this particular, is a better guide, both in prose and verse:

"The proper study of mankind is man."

Essay on Man.

It may be asked, indeed, why mankind should not have the accent on the first syllable as well as womankind; it may be answered, so it has when it is to distinguish it from womankind; but when it is used absolutely, it includes womankind; and to avoid the distinction which an accent on the first syllable would imply, it very properly throws the accent on the general and not on the specific part of the word.

MANLIKE, măn'like. a. Having the complete qualities of a man, befitting a man.

MANLESS, măn'lĕs. a. Without men, not manned.

MANLINESS, măn'lē-nĕs. s. Dignity, bravery, stoutness.

MANOEUVRE, măn'ō-vŭr. s. An attempt, out of the common course of action, to relieve ourselves, or annoy our adversary; and generally used in maritime affairs.

☞ This word, though current in conversation, and really useful, is in no Dictionary I have met with. The triphthong eu has no correspondent sound in our language, and I have given it what I thought the nearest to it; but as the word seems to be universally adopted, it ought to be anglicised, and may be safely pronounced as I have marked it, by those who cannot give it the exact French sound.

MANTUA, mân'tshŭ-â. s. (333). A lady's gown.

☞ Dr. Johnson says this word was probably corrupted from the French manteau: and Mr. Elphinston, in his zeal for an homophonous orthography, as it may be called, says, "Manteau, not Mantua, having given title to the silk, the maker of "mantoes, or mantows, will have the honour of leading the fashions at the court "of truth, when, under so glorious patronage, she announces herself a Mantoe-maker, or Mantowmaker. Paduasoy is a "similar falsification of Podesoy, the English offspring of the French Poudèsoie. "The Italian cities are much obliged to "affectation for having so long complimented them at her own expence. Guided by etymology, she had no business "with the sound; and a stranger to analogy was not likely to know, that a mantel, mantoè, or cloke, was probably the "first silken task of the English Mantoe-maker."

☞ Mr. Sheridan, in placing the accent on the second syllable of this word, differs from Dr. Johnson, and every other orthoepist, who uniformly accent the word on the third syllable, as I have done.

MARIETS, mār'rĕ-ĕts. s. (81). A kind of violet.

MARIGOLD, mār'rĕ-gōld. s. (81). A yellow flower.

☞ The a in the first syllable of this word is, by Mr. Sheridan and Mr. Buchanan, pronounced long and slender, as in the proper name Mary; and this is supposed to be the true sound, as it is imagined the flower was dedicated to the Blessed Virgin: but Mr. Scott, Mr. Perry, and W. Johnston, give the a the short sound, as in marry; and in this they appear not only more agreeable to general usage, but to that prevailing tendency of shortening the antepenultimate vowel, which runs through the language (505) (535). Losing the simple in the compound can be no objection, when we reflect on the frequency of this coalition (515). Nor is it unworthy of observation, that gold, in this word, preserves its true sound, and is not corrupted into goold.

To MARINATE, mār'rĕ-nāte. v. a. To salt fish, and then preserve them in oil or vinegar. Not used.

MARINE, mā-rēēn'. a. (112). Belonging to the sea.

MATRONAL, mât'rō-nâl, or mâ-trō'nâl. a. Suitable to a matron, constituting a matron.

☞ I have excluded Mr. Sheridan's pronunciation, which makes the two first syllables of this word exactly like matron, because the word is a primitive in our language, derived from the Latin matronalis, and therefore, according to English analogy, when reduced to three syllables, ought to have the accent on the antepenultimate (see ACADEMY); and this accent has, in simples, always a shortening power (503) (535): The second pronunciation, though not so strictly agreeable to analogy as the first, is still preferable to Mr. Sheridan's. Matronish and matronly ought to have the first vowel and the accent as in matron, because they are compounds of our own; but we do not subjoin al to words as we do ish and ly, and, therefore words of that termination are under a different predicament. Something like this seems to have struck Mr. Sheridan and Dr. Johnson when they accented the word Patronal: for though this word is exactly of the same form, and is perfectly similar in the quantity of the Latin vowels, we find matronal marked with the accent upon the first syllable, and patronal on the second. From Dr. Johnson's accentuation we cannot collect the quantity of the vowel; his authority, therefore, in the word in question, is only for the accent on the first syllable. To him may be added, Mr. Scott, Mr. Perry, and Entick, who accent and sound the a as Mr. Sheridan has done. Dr. Ash alone seems to favour the pronunciation I have given.

Digitized from Best Copy Available

MATRONLY, mă'trŭn-lė. ad. Elderly, ancient.—See MATRONAL.

MATROSS, mă-trŏs'. s. Matrosses are a sort of soldiers next in degree under the gunners, who assist about the guns in traversing, spunging, firing, and loading them.

MATTER, măt'tŭr. s. (98). Body, substance extended; materials, that of which any thing is composed; subject, thing treated; the whole, the very thing supposed; affair, business, in a familiar sense; cause of disturbance; import, consequence; thing, object, that which has some particular relation; space or quantity nearly computed; purulent running.

To MATTER, măt'tŭr. v. n. To be of importance, to import; to generate matter by suppuration.

To MATTER, măt'tŭr. v. a. To regard, not to neglect.

MATTERY, măt'tŭr-ė. a. Purulent, generating matter.

MATTOCK, măt'tŭk. s. (166). A kind of toothed instrument to pull up wood; a pickaxe.

MATTRESS, măt'trĭs. s. (99). A kind of quilt made to lie upon.

MATURITY, mă-tū'rė-tė. s. Ripeness, completion.

MAUDLIN, mâwd'lĭn. a. Drunk, fuddled.

MAUGRE, mâw'gŭr. ad. (416). In spite of, notwithstanding.

To MAUL, mâwl. v. a. To beat, to bruise, to hurt in a coarse or butcherly manner.—See MALL.

MAUL, mâwl. s. A heavy hammer. Obsolete.

MAUND, mând. s. (214). A hand basket.

☞ Mr. Sheridan and Mr. Perry give the sound of a in all to this word. Dr. Kenrick gives both the a in hard and that in all, but prefers the first.—See TAUNT.

To MAUNDER, mân'dŭr. (214). To grumble, to murmur.

☞ Mr. Sheridan, Buchanan, W. Johnston, and Mr. Perry, pronounce the diphthong in this word as in Maund; but Mr. Nares and Mr. Elphinston, whose opinion in this point is of the greatest weight, pronounce it as I have marked it.—See TAUNT.

whence they are called stomach or Maw-worms.

MAXILLAR, măg-zĭl'lăr. (478).
MAXILLARY, măks'il-lăr-ē. (477). } a. Belonging to the jaw-bone.

☞ There is a diversity in the pronunciation of this word, which makes it necessary to recur to principles to decide which is best. Dr. Johnson, Mr. Sheridan, Mr. Nares, and Mr. Barclay, accent it on the first syllable; and Dr. Ash, Dr. Kenrick, W. Johnston, Bailey, and Entick, on the second: and notwithstanding this majority, I am of opinion that the first manner is right. For though Maxillary and the other similar words of this termination are of the same number of syllables with the Latin words from which they are derived, as Maxillaris, Capillaris, &c. (503, e); yet as our language has an aversion to the accent on the a in these terminations which have the accent in the Latin words (512), it seems agreeable to our own analogy to place the stress on that syllable to which we give a secondary stress in the original word, and that is the first.—See ACADEMY, and MAMMILLARY.

MEDICALLY, mĕd'ē-kăl-ē. ad. Physically, medicinally.

MEDICAMENT, mĕd'ē-kă-mĕnt. s. Any thing used in healing, generally topical applications.

☞ All our orthoëpists, but Bailey, pronounce this word with the accent on the first syllable; but my judgment much fails me if the true pronunciation ought not to be with the accent on the second, as in Predicament. My reason is, that this is the syllable on which we place the secondary accent in pronouncing the Latin words medicāmĕntum and predicamentum; and it has often been observed, that this is our guide for accenting English words formed from the Latin by dropping a syllable.—See ACADEMY.

☞ Dr. Johnson tells us, that this word is now commonly pronounced medicinal, with the accent on the second syllable, but more properly and more agreeably to the best authorities medicĭnal. If by the best authorities Dr. Johnson means the Poets, the question is decided; but I look upon Poets to be the worst authorities in this case, as, by the very rules of their art, a licence is given them to depart from the general pronunciation; and that they often avail themselves of this licence, cannot be disputed. But if by more properly Dr. Johnson alludes to the long i in the Latin medicīnus or medicīnalis, nothing can be more inconclusive. If the word be perfectly Latin, as well as English, we generally place the accent on the same syllable as in the original, as acumen, decorum, &c. but frequently otherwise, as orator, senator, character, &c. But if this Latin accentuation were to be servilely followed in Latin words anglicised, we should overturn the whole fabric of our pronunciation. Thus doctrinal, pastoral, &c. &c. must have the accent on the second syllable instead of the first, and nothing but confusion would ensue. The truth is, the strong tendency of our language is to an antepenultimate accent (503); and it is with reluctance we ever place it lower, except in words of our own composition, or where the latter syllables have either an assemblage of consonants or a diphthong; yet even in this case we find the antepenultimate accent sometimes prevail, as ancestor, amnesty, magistrate, &c. and counterpoise, porcelain, chamberlain, interreign, &c. So that by attempting to bring our pronunciation under the laws of the Latin language, we disturb and pervert it. Let Poets, therefore, who have, and, perhaps, in some cases, ought to have, a language different from prose, enjoy the privilege of their art, and while we are reading them let us conform to their rules; but let us not strive against the general current of prosaic pronunciation, which is always right, and which is equally negligent of the peculiarities of poets, and the pedantry of ancient derivation. The antepenultimate accentuation of this word is supported by Dr. Ash, Dr. Kenrick, Mr. Perry, Mr. Smith, W. Johnston, Barclay, Bailey, Fenning, and Entick. Mr. Sheridan gives both, and, by placing this accentuation first, seems to prefer it to the other.—See INDECOROUS and INIMICAL.

MEDICINE, mĕd'dĕ-sĭn. s. Any remedy administered by a physician.

☞ All our orthoepists tell us that this word is generally pronounced in two syllables, as if written medcine; That so gross a vulgarism should gain ground in our language, is an imputation on our national taste. Our poets, who, when tortured for a word, often torture a word to ease themselves, are generally guilty of one part only of the cruelty of Procrustes, and that is of shortening such words as are too long for their verse; and these mutilations too often slide into our prosaic pronunciation: but against this abuse every accurate speaker ought to be on his guard. Nay, Cowley, as Mr. Nares informs us, crushes medicinal into two syllables; and instances from Milton of this kind are innumerable.

Mr. Elphinston adopts the dissyllable pronunciation as more agreeable to its immediate origin, the French medecene: but as we preserve the i in this word, the Latin medicina seems its most authentic original, and demands the sound of the i in medicine as much as in ominous, mutinous, and original, which Shakespeare and Milton sink in the same manner as the word in question.

☞ I differ from all our orthoepists in the accentuation of this word; for though they are uniform here, they differ so much from each other in similar words, as to show they are not very sure of the principles. My reasons for accenting the first syllable of this word are the same as for the same accentuation of Maxillary, and Papillary, which see.

☞ This word was universally, till of late, pronounced with the accent on the second syllable, as Dr. Johnson, W. Johnston, Dr. Kenrick, Barclay, Bailey, Buchanan, Fenning, and Perry, have marked it. Some speakers have endeavoured to pronounce it with the accent on the first, as we find it marked in Mr. Nares, Dr. Ash, Scott, and Entick: but this is an innovation unsuitable to the genius of our pronunciation; which, in dissyllables having a diphthong in the last, inclines us to place the accent on that syllable, as much as in devoir, which we find accented on the last by all our orthoepists without exception.

☞ Mr. Sheridan pronounces the e in the first syllable of this word, like the a in march; and it is certain that, about thirty years ago, this was the general pronunciation; but since that time the sound of a has been gradually wearing away; and the sound of e is so fully established, that the former is now become gross and vulgar, and is only to be heard among the lower orders of people. It is highly probable that, however coarse this sound of e may now seem, it was once not only the common pronunciation, but the most agreeable to analogy. We still find, that the vowel i before r, followed by another consonant, sinks into a broader sound by taking the short sound of e, which is really the short sound of a slender a as virgin, virtue, &c.; and it is a similar alteration which takes place in the e before r, followed by another consonant, in clerk, serjeant, Derby, &c. where this vowel falls into the broader sound of the Italian a. Sermon, service, vermin, &c. are still pronounced, by the vulgar, as if written sarmon, sarvice, varment, &c.; and this was probably the ancient manner of pronouncing every e in the same situation. This analogy is now totally exploded; and, except clerk, serjeant, and a few proper names, we have scarcely another word in the language where the e has not its true sound. But instead of saying with Mr. Nares, that merchant has returned to the proper sound of e, we may with greater probability assert, that this and every other word of the same form have acquired a sound of e, which they never had before; and which, though a feebler and a shorter sound, conduces to the simplicity and regularity of our pronunciation, Dr. Kenrick concurs, in my opinion, that pronouncing the e in this word like a is vulgar; and every other orthoepist, who gives the sound of the vowels, marks it as I have done.

METAGRAMMATISM, mĕt-ā-grăm'ā-tĭzm. An anagrammatic transposition of letters, so as to form another word; as out of the letters of Addison may be formed Siddona.

METAL, mĕt'tl. s. A hard compact body, malleable and capable of fusion. The metals are six in number; first, gold; second, silver; third, copper; fourth, tin; fifth, iron; and sixth, lead. Some have added mercury or quicksilver to the number of metals; but as it wants malleability, the criterion of metals, it is more properly ranked among the semi-metals. Courage, spirit.

☞ As the metaphorical sense of this word, courage and spirit, has passed into a different orthography, mettle; so the orthography of this sense has corrupted the pronunciation of the original word, and made it perfectly similar to the metaphorical one. It is almost the only instance in the language where al is pronounced in this manner, and the impropriety is so striking as to encourage an accurate speak-

METALLIFEROUS, mĕt-tăl-lĭf'fĕr-ŭs. a. Producing metals.

METALLINE, mĕt'tăl-lĭne. a. Impregnated with metal; consisting of metal.

☞ Mr. Sheridan, Dr. Johnson, Dr. Ash, and Bailey, accent the second syllable of this word; but Dr. Kenrick, W. Johnston, Mr. Scott, Buchanan, Barclay, Fenning, and Entick, the first. I do not hesitate to pronounce the latter mode the more correct; first, as it is a simple in our language, and, having three syllables, requires the accent on the antepenultimate, notwithstanding the double l (see Medicinal). In the next place, though there is no metallinus in Latin, it ought to follow the analogy of words of that termination derived from Latin, as Crystallinus, Serpentinus, &c. which, when anglicised, lose the last syllable, and remove the accent to the first.—See ACADEMY. For the i in the last syllable, see Principles, No. 148, 149.

METALLIST, mĕ-tăl'lĭst. s. A worker of metals, one skilled in metals.

METALLOGRAPHY, mĕt-tăl-lŏg'grâ-fĕ. s. (518). An account of metals.

METALLURGIST, mĕt'tăl-lûr-jĭst. s. A worker of metals

METALLURGY, mĕt'tăl-lûr-jĕ. s. The art of working metals, or separating them from their ore.

☞ This word is accented three different ways by different orthöepists. Dr. Johnson, Barclay, Fenning, and Perry, accent it on the second syllable; Sheridan, Buchanan, and Bailey, on the third; and Ash, Scott, Nares, and Entick, on the first; and Kenrick on the first and third. The accent on the first seems to me the most correct. Bailey derives this word from the Greek μεταλ-λουργια; and words of this form, upon dropping a syllable when anglicised, remove the accent higher, as philosophy, philology, &c. from Φιλοσοφια, Φιλολογια. The accent thus removed, in enclitical terminations (515), generally falls upon the antepenultimate syllable, unless in the two succeeding syllables there are uncombinable consonants, as chiromancy, oligarchy; and in this case, for the ease of pronunciation, the accent generally rises to the next syllable, which throws a secondary or alternate accent on the penultimate; and by this means gives the organs a greater force to pronounce the uncombinable consonants than if they immediately followed the principal stress. See Principles, No. 517, 519.

To METAMORPHOSE, mĕt-tâ-môr'fŏz. v. a. To change the form of any thing.

METAMORPHOSIS, mĕt-tâ-môr'fŏ-sĭs. s. (520). Transformation, change of shape.

METHODICAL, mē-*th*ŏd'ē-kăl. a. Ranged or proceeding in due or just order.

METHODICALLY, mē-*th*ŏd'ē-kăl-ē. ad. According to method and order.

TO METHODISE, mĕ'*th*ō-dīze. v. a. To regulate, to dispose in order.

METHODIST, mĕ'*th*ō-dĭst. s. This word anciently signified a physician who practised by theory. One of a new kind of Puritans lately arisen, so called from their profession to live by rules, and in constant method.

METHOUGHT, mē-*th*awt'. The pret. of Methinks.

METONYMICAL, mĕt-tō-nĭm'mē-kăl. a. Put by metonymy for something else.

METONYMICALLY, mĕt-tō-nĭm'mē-kăl-ē. ad. By metonymy, not literally.

METONYMY, mē-tŏn'ē-mē, or mĕt'ō-nĭm-ē. s. A rhetorical figure, by which one word is put for another, as the matter for the materiate; He died by steel, that is, by a sword.

☞ Authorities for the two different ways of accenting this word are so nearly balanced, that it is hard to say which preponderates. Dr. Johnson, Dr. Kenrick, Dr. Ash, Mr. Perry, Buchanan, and Bailey, are for the first; and Mr. Sheridan, Mr. Nares, W. Johnston, Mr. Scott, Mr. Barclay, Entick, and Gibbons, the author of the Rhetorick, for the last. In this case the ear and analogy ought to decide. I have no doubt but the accent on the first syllable was the ancient mode of pronouncing this word, as we find it so accented in almost all the systems of Rhetorick, published several years ago for the use of schools: and as these words from the Greek were generally pronounced in the Latin manner; that is, the accent on the antepenultimate in Metonymia, and not on the penultimate, as in Μετωνυμία, the secondary accent naturally fell on the first syllable, which is naturally become the principal of the English Metonymy (503). —(See ACADEMY). But that the ear is pleased with the antepenultimate accent cannot be doubted; and that this word has as great a right to that accent as lipothymy, homonymy, synonymy, &c. is unquestionable. Besides, the enclitical accent, as this may be called, is so agreeable to the ear, that, without evident reasons to the contrary, it ought to be preferred. See Principles, No 513, 518, 519.

METOPOSCOPY, mĕt-tō-pŏs'kō-pē. s. (518). The study of physiognomy.

METRE, mē'tĕr. s. (416). Speech confined to a certain number and harmonick disposition of syllables.

To MICHE, mitsh. v. n. To be secret or covered.

MICHER, mitsh'ŭr. s. A lazy loiterer, who skulks about in corners and by-places; hedge-creeper.

☞ This word, and the verb from which it is derived, are in Ireland pronounced with the short i, as Mr. Sheridan has marked it; but I am much mistaken if it is not in England pronounced with the long i, as more agreeable to the orthography. There is a character in the farce of the "Stage Coach," written by Farquhar, called Micher, and this I recollect to have heard with the i pronounced long.

MICKLE, mĭk'kl. a. (405). Much, great. Obsolete.

MICROGRAPHY, mī-krŏg'rā-fē. s. (129) The description of the parts of such very small objects as are discernible only with a microscope.

☞ Why Mr. Sheridan should cross the general line of pronunciation, by accenting this word on the first syllable, cannot be conceived, especially as he has accented Micrometer properly. See Principles, No. 518.

MICROSCOPE, mī'krō-skōpe. s. An optick instrument for viewing small objects.

MICROMETER, mī-krŏm'mē-tŭr. s. (129) (518). An instrument contrived to measure small spaces.

MILLENNIAL, mĭl-lĕn'nē-ăl. a. (113). Pertaining to the millennium.

MILLEPEDES, mĭl'lē-pēdz, or mĭl-lĕp'ē-dēz. s. Wood-lice, so called from their numerous feet.

☞ The former pronunciation of this word is adopted by Dr. Johnson, Dr. Kenrick, Mr. Sheridan, Mr. Scott, and Entick; and the latter by Mr. Nares, W. Johnston, Buchanan, and Perry. That the latter is more fashionable cannot be denied; but that the former is more correct is evident, from similar words which have been anglicised; thus Bipeds and Quadrupeds have dropped their Latin final syllable; and why the word in question should retain it cannot be conceived. Besides, though seldom used in the singular, there is no reason why it should not be so used; and then it must necessarily become a Millipede: Centipede, properly Centiped, is adopted; and by forming Centipeds in the plural, shows us how we ought to form and pronounce the word in question; and if Antipodes has not yet submitted to this analogy, it is because, like Cantharides, Caryatides, Manes, &c. it is never used in the singular.—See ANTIPODES.

MILLER, mĭl'lŭr. s. (98). One who attends a mill.

MILLER'S-THUMB, mĭl'lŭrz-*th*ŭm'. A small fish found in brooks, called likewise a bullhead.

MILLION, mĭl'yŭn. s. (113). The number of a hundred myriads, or ten hundred thousand; a proverbial name for any very great number.

MILLIONTH, mĭl'yŭn*th*. a. The ten hundred thousandth.

MILLSTONE, mĭl'stōne. s. The stone by which corn is ground.

MILT, mĭlt. s. The sperm of the male fish; the spleen.

MILTER, mĭlt'ŭr. s. (98). The male of any fish, the female being called spawner.

MILTWORT, mĭlt'wŭrt. s. An herb.

MIME, mīme. s. A buffoon who practises gesticulations, either representative of some action, or merely contrived to raise mirth.

To MIME, mīme. v. a. To play the mime.

MIMER, mī'mŭr. s. (98). A mimick, a buffoon.

MIMETIC, mē-mĕt'ĭk. a. (129). Apt to imitate; having a tendency to imitation.

☞ This word is in no Dictionary that I have met with; but as it is regularly derived from the Greek μιμητικος, and is adopted by good speakers, there is no reason why it should not be inserted, especially as it seems to convey a different idea from similar words; for the adjective mimick seems to imply the act of imitating; and imitative, the power, capability, or habit of imitating; while mimetic signifies a proneness or tendency to imitation. Besides, mimetic seems to imply a ludicrous imitation of the actions and passions of living creatures; but imitative is applied to any objects, and generally implies serious and respectable imitation. Thus we say: "Painting is an imitative art, and "that apes are very mimetic;" and "it is "observable, that those who are very mi-"metic are seldom imitative of grand and "noble objects." Harris, therefore, seems to have used this word rather inaccurately, when he says, "The mimetic art of poe-"try has been hitherto considered as fetch-"ing its imitation from mere natural re-"semblance. In this it has been shown "much inferior to painting, and nearly "equal to musick."—Harris's Three Treatises, ch. iv.

MIMICAL, mĭm'mē-kăl. a. Imitative, befitting a mimick, acting the mimick.

MIMICALLY, mĭm'mē-kăl-ē. ad. In imitation, in a mimical manner.

MIMICK, mĭm'mĭk. s. (543). A ludicrous imitator, a buffoon who copies another's act or manner; a mean or servile imitator.

MIMICK, mĭm'mĭk. a. Imitative.

MINDLESS, mind'lĕs. a. Inattentive, regardless; not endued with a mind, having no intellectual powers.

MIND-STRICKEN, mind'strĭk-k'n. a. (103). Moved, affected in his mind.

MINE, mine. pron. possessive. Belonging to me.

☞ In reading the Scripture, as, "Mine "eyes have seen thy salvation," we are at no loss for the pronunciation of this word, as the dignity and solemnity of the composition invariably directs us to give the i its long sound, as in fine, line, &c.; but in Milton and other authors, where there is no such dignity or solemnity, this sound of the word has an intolerable stiffness, and ought not to have been used.—Thus in the Spectator, No. 195, Mr. Addison, says: 'Were I to prescribe a rule 'for drinking, it should be formed upon a 'saying quoted by Sir William Temple.—"The first glass for myself, the second "for my friends, the third for good hu-"mour, and the fourth for mine enemies."

In Milton too:

——————"Methought
"Close at mine ear one called me forth to
"walk." Par. Lost

In Shakespeare also:

——"Sleeping within mine orchard,
"My custom always in the afternoon,
"Upon my secure hour thy uncle stole,
"With juice of cursed hebona in a phial,
"And in the porches of mine ears did pour
"The leprous distilment."—— Hamlet.

In all these instances we find a formality, a staleness and uncouthness of sound, that is peculiarly unpleasant to the ear; and as this mode of writing was introduced when our language may be said to have been in its infancy for the sake of euphony (for it is clearly ungrammatical); so now, when it may be said that it has arrived at its maturity, the very same reason seems to entitle the present age to alter it; that is, I mean the pronunciation of it, by substituting my, pronounced like me, in its stead.

The disagreeable sound which mine has in these cases, has induced several readers to pronounce it min; but by thus mincing the matter, (if the pun will be pardoned me), they mutilate the word, and leave it more disagreeable to the ear than it was before. Readers therefore have no choice, but either to pronounce it as it is written, and to let the author be answerable for the ill sound; or, in all language but that of Scripture, to change it into my, pronounced like me.

Shakespeare seems to have used this word ludicrously in the Merry Wives of Windsor, where Falstaff says, "Mine host of the "Garter—truly, mine host, I must turn "away some of my followers;" and the host, by requesting Falstaff to speak scholarly and wisely, seems to intimate, that this use of the word mine before a vowel or an h was the most correct way of speaking. But though thy will, in familiar or ludicrous language, admit of being changed into the sound of the—mine will, on no occasion, suffer an alteration into min. When the vowel is used familiarly, it is always a burlesque upon the grave use of it, and therefore requires the grave sound, that the humour may not be lost.

MIRACLE, mĭr'â-kl. s. A wonder, something above human power; in theology, an effect above human or natural power, performed in attestation of some truth.

☞ I have differed from Mr. Sheridan in the sound of the first syllable of this word, as he seems to have adopted a vulgar pronunciation, which does not distinguish between the sound of i, succeeded by single or double r, not final; and the sound of i final, or succeeded by r and another consonant. In the former case the i is pure, and has exactly the same sound as its representative y in Pyramid, Lyric, &c.; in the latter the i goes into short e or u, as in Birth, Virtue, &c. or Sir, Stir, &c. See Principles, No. 108, 109, 110.

MIRTHLESS, mérth'lés. a. Joyless, cheerless.

MIRY, mí'ré. a. Deep in mud, muddy; consisting of mire.

MIS, mis. An inseparable particle used in composition to mark an ill sense, or depravation of the meaning, as chance, luck; mischance, ill luck; to like, to be pleased; to mislike, to be offended. It is derived from mes, in Teutonick and French, used in the same sense.

☞ What is remarkable in the pronunciation of this inseparable preposition is, that the s whether the accent be on it or not, or whether it be followed by a sharp or flat consonant, it always retains its sharp hissing sound, and never goes into z, like dis and ex. The reason seems to be, that the latter come to us compounded, and have their meaning so mingled with the word as to coalesce with it, while mis remains a distinct prefix, and has but one uniform meaning.

MISACCEPTATION, mĭs-âk-sép-tâ'shŭn. s. The act of taking in a wrong sense.

MISADVENTURE, mĭs-âd-vĕn'tshŭre. s. Mischance, misfortune, ill luck; in law, manslaughter.

MISCARRIAGE, mĭs-kăr'rĭdje. s. (90). Unhappy event of an undertaking; abortion, act of bringing forth before the time.

To MISCARRY, mĭs-kăr'rē. v. n. To fail, not to have the intended event; to have an abortion.

MISCELLANEOUS, mĭs-sĕl-lā'nē-ŭs. a. Mingled, composed of various kinds.

MISCELLANEOUSNESS, mĭs-sĕl-lā'nē-ŭs-nĕs. s. Composition of various kinds.

MISCELLANY, mĭs'sĕl-lĕn-ē. a. (503). Mixed of various kinds.

☞ The accent on the first syllable of this word, which is the accentuation of all our orthoepists, except Dr. Kenrick, is a proof of the tendency to follow the secondary accent of the original Latin word, notwithstanding the double consonant in the middle. Thus Miscellanea, in our pronunciation of it, having a stress on the first, becomes the accent when the word is anglicised by dropping a syllable. See ACADEMY, MAMILLARY, and MEDULLARY.

MISCELLANY, mĭs-sĕl-lĕn-ē. s. A mass or collection formed out of various kinds.

To MISCAST, mĭs-kăst'. v. a. To take a wrong account of.

MISCHANCE, mĭs-tshānse'. s. Ill luck, ill fortune.

To MISCHIEF, mĭs'tshĭf. v. a. To hurt, to harm, to injure.

MISCHIEFMAKER, mĭs'tshĭf-mā-kŭr. s. One who causes mischief.

MISCHIEVOUS, mĭs'tshē-vŭs. a. (277). Harmful, hurtful, destructive; spiteful, malicious.

☞ There is an accentuation of this word upon the second syllable, chiefly confined to the vulgar, which, from its agreeableness to analogy, is well worthy of being adopted by the learned. Analogy certainly requires that the verb formed from the noun mischief should be mischieve, as from thief, thieve; grief, grieve; belief, believe, &c. with the accent on the second syllable (492); and from such a verb would naturally be formed the adjective in question. But what analogy can give sanction to a vulgarism? What Pope observes of the learned in another case, is but too applicable in this:

"So much they scorn the crowd, that if the "throng
"By chance go right, they purposely go
"wrong."

To which we may add, that in language, as in many other cases, it is safer to be wrong with the polite than with the vulgar.

MISCHIEVOUSLY, mĭs'tshē-vŭs-lē. ad. Noxiously, hurtfully, wickedly.

French Je me trompe: I am mistaken means I misconceive, I am in an errour, more frequently than I am ill understood; but, my opinion is mistaken, means my opinion is not rightly understood. Whatever may have been the cause of this irregularity, it has long been an eye-sore to our Grammarians, but has got such possession of the language as to render it almost incurable. Let us avoid it as much as we will in speaking and writing, it will still remain upon our books as a part of the language. Mistaken wretch for mistaking wretch is an apostrophe that occurs every where among our poets, particularly those of the stage; the most incorrigible of all, and the most likely to fix and disseminate an errour of this kind. Our old writers were ignorant of Grammar, and thought all phrases good that did not quarrel with the ear; but that is not the case since the labours of Johnson and Lowth. The best way therefore to remedy these abuses, is to avoid them in future. With respect to Dr. Johnson's opinion, that this verb is used in a reciprocal sense, it may be observed, that this is the case with all neuter verbs of action; or as Dr. Lowth calls them, intransitively active, or transitively neuter; but the verb in question, I am mistaken for I am mistaking, seems rather to be what the Latins call a verb Deponent; an active verb with a passive form: an irregularity which is no recommendation to the Latin language, and is a blemish in ours. I recollect but one verb more of this kind; and that is, to speed in the sense of to succeed well or ill, which as a verb neuter ought to have no passive form; and yet Pope says,

"A dire dilemma! either way I'm sped;
"If foes, they write; if friends, they read "me dead."

And Otway in the Orphan says,

"———I'm marry'd—Death, I'm sped."

MISTAKE, mis-tāke'. s. Misconception, errour.

MISTAKINGLY, mis-tā'king-lė. ad. Erroneously, falsely.

To MISSTATE, mis-stāte'. v. a. To state wrong.

To MISTEACH, mis-tētsh'. v. a. To teach wrong.

To MISTEMPER, mis-tĕm'pŭr. v. a. To temper ill.

MISTER, mis'tŭr. a. (98). [From mestier, trade, French.] What mister, means what kind of. Obsolete.

To MISTERM, mis-tĕrm'. v. a. To term erroneously.

To MISTHINK, mis-think'. v. a. To think ill, to think wrong.

To MISTIME, mis-time'. v. a. Not to time right, not to adapt properly with regard to time.

MISTINESS, mis'tė-nĕs. s. Cloudiness, state of being overcast.

MISTION, mis'tshŭn. s. (464). The state of being mingled.

MISTLETOE, miz'zl-tō. s. (173). The name of one of those plants which draw their nourishment from some other plant. It generally grows on the apple tree, sometimes on the oak, and was held in great veneration by the ancient Druids.

MISTLIKE, mist'like. a. Like a mist.

MISTOLD, mis-tōld'. Part. pass. of Mistell.

MISTOOK, mis-tŏŏk'. Part. pass. of Mistake.

MISTRESS, mis'tris. s. A woman who governs, correlative to subject or to servant; a title of common respect; a woman skilled in any thing; a woman teacher; a woman beloved and courted; a term of contemptuous address; a whore, a concubine.

☞ The same haste and necessity of dispatch, which has corrupted Master into Mister, has, when it is a title of civility only, contracted Mistress into Missis.—Thus, Mrs. Montague, Mrs. Carter, &c. are pronounced Missis Montague, Missis Carter, &c. To pronounce the word as it is written, would, in these cases, appear quaint and pedantick.

MISTRUST, mis-trŭst'. s. Diffidence, suspicion, want of confidence.

To MISTRUST, mis-trŭst'. v. a. To suspect, to doubt, to regard with diffidence.

MISTRUSTFUL, mis-trŭst'fŭl. a. Diffident, doubting.

Mizmaze, mĭz'māze. s. A labyrinth.

Mizzen, mĭz'zn. s. (103). The mizzen is a mast in the stern of a ship.

Mnemonicks, nē-mŏn'nĭks. s. The art of memory.—See Pneumatick.

☞ Mr. Sheridan is the only lexicographer, who gives the sounds of the letters, that has inserted this word, except Mr. Barclay. The former spells the word mnemon-iks, and leaves us to pronounce the first syllable as we can; while the latter leaves out the m, and spells the word nemonicks; which, in my opinion, is the way it ought to be pronounced.

Mo, mō. More in number.—See Enow.

To Moan, mōne. v. a. (295). To lament, to deplore.

To Moan, mōne. v. n. To grieve, to make lamentation.

Moat, mōte. s. (295). A canal of water round a house for defence.

To Moat, mōte. v. a. To surround with canals by way of defence.

Mob, mŏb. s. The crowd, a tumultuous rout; a kind of female head-dress.

☞ Toller tells us, that in the latter end of the reign of King Charles II. the rabble that attended the Earl of Shaftesbury's partisans was first called mobile vulgus, and afterwards by contraction the mob; and ever since the word has become proper English. To which we may add, that in Mr. Addison's time this word was not adopted; for he says, (Spectator, No. 135), "I dare not answer that mob, rep, "pos, incog, and the like," will not in time be looked upon as a part of our tongue."

To Mob, mŏb. v. a. To harass, or overbear by tumult.

Mobbish, mŏb'bĭsh. a. Mean, done after the manner of the mob.

To Mobble, mŏ'bl. v. a. To dress grossly or inelegantly. Obsolete.

☞ This word now exists as spoken, no where but in the Hamlet of Skakespeare:

"But who, alas! had seen the mobled
"queen!"

This is always pronounced mobb-led upon the stage; and this reading appears more correct than mabled and mob-led, which some critics have substituted; for Dr. Farmer tells us, he has not met with this word in Shirley's Gentleman of Venice:

"The moon does mobble up herself."

This seems to receive confirmation from the name women give to a cap, which is little more than a piece of linen drawn together with strings round the head. The learned Mr. Upton's supposition, that this word signifies led by the mob, is an anachronism, as the word mob was not in use in the time of Shakespeare.

MONOGAMY, mō-nŏg'gā-mē. s. (518). Marriage of one wife.

MONOGRAM, mŏn'nō-grăm. s. A cypher, a character compounded of several letters.

MONOLOGUE, mŏn'nō-lŏg. s. (338). A scene in which a person of the drama speaks by himself; a soliloquy.

☞ Why Mr. Sheridan should pronounce Dialogue with the last syllable like log, Prologue with the same syllable like lug, and Monologue rhyming with vogue, I cannot conceive. The first syllable of all words of this termination, when unaccented, are, in my opinion, uniformly like that in Dialogue. Mr. Scott has marked it in the same manner as I have done; Mr. Barclay has followed Mr. Sheridan.

MONOME, mŏn'nōme. s. In algebra, a quantity that has but one denomination or name.

MONOMACHY, mŏ-nŏm'â-kē. A duel; a single combat.

☞ Nothing can more show the uncertainty of our orthoëpists in the pronunciation of unusual words, than the accentuation of this, and those of a similar form. The only words of this termination we have in Johnson's Dictionary, are Logomachy, Monomachy, Sciomachy, and Theomachy. The two first of which he accented on the first syllable, and the two last on the second. Mr. Sheridan has but two of them Logomachy and Sciomachy; the first of which he accents on the first syllable, and the last on the second. Mr. Scott has none of them. Dr. Ash has them all, and accents Logomachy, Monomachy and Theomachy, on the first syllable; and Sciomachy on the second. Bailey accents Monomachy and Sciomachy on the first syllable, and Logomachy and Theomachy on the third. W. Johnston has only Logomachy, which he accents on the second syllable. Mr. Perry has only Theomachy, which he accents on the second likewise. Entick has them all, and accents them on the first; and Dr. Kenrick accents them all on the second syllable.

This confusion among our orthoëpists plainly shews the little attention which is paid to analogy; for this would have informed them, that these words are under the same predicament as those ending in graphy, logy, &c and therefore ought all to have the penultimate accent. An obscure idea of this induced them to accent some of these words one way, and some another; but nothing can be more evident than the necessity of accenting all of them uniformly as the same syllable. See Principles, No. 513, 518, &c.

As to Dr. Johnson's observation, which is repeated by Dr. Kenrick and Mr. Nares, that Sciomachy ought to be written Skiamachy, I have only to observe at present, that writing a instead of o is more agreeable to etymology; but changing c into k, either in writing or pronouncing, is an irregularity of the most pernicious kind, as it has a tendency to overturn the most settled rules of the language.—See SCEPTICK, and Principles, No. 350.

MONOPETALOUS, mŏn-nō-pĕt'tăl-lŭs. s. It is used for such flowers as are formed out of one leaf, howsoever they may be seemingly cut into small ones.

MONOPOLIST, mō-nŏp'pō-lĭst. s. One who by engrossing or patent obtains the sole power or privilege of vending any commodity.

TO MONOPOLIZE, mō-nŏp'pō-līze. v.a. To have the sole power or privilege of vending any commodity.

MONOPTOTE, mŏn'nŏp-tōte, or mō-nŏp'tōte. s. Is a noun used only in some one oblique case.

☞ The second pronunciation which is Dr. Johnson's, Dr. Ash's, Mr. Barclay's, and Entick's, is the most usual; but the first, which is Mr. Sheridan's, is more agreeable to analogy; for the word is derived from monoptōton, which we pronounce with two accents, one on the first, and another on the third: and when we shorten the word by anglicising it, we generally place the accent on the syllable we accented in the original.—See HETEROCLITE.

MONOSTICH, mŏn'nō-stĭk. s. (509). A composition of one verse.

☞ There is an incorrect pronunciation of this and similar words, chiefly among the vulgar, which is sounding the word as if it were written mo-oold. This sound is often heard among incorrect speakers, where there is no diphthong, as in cold, bold, sold, &c. pronounced co-oold, bo-oold, so-oold, &c. while the true pronunciation of these words has nothing of the u or oo in it, but is exactly like foal'd, sol'd, cajol'd, &c. the preterits of the verbs to foal, to sole, and to cajole, &c. For there is no middle sound between owl and hole; and the words in question must either rhyme with bowl'd or foal'd; but the last is clearly the true pronunciation.

This word, before Dr. Johnson wrote his Dictionary, was frequently written mold, which was perfectly agreeable to its Saxon derivation, and was less liable to mispronunciation than the present spelling. The word has three significations; Mould, concretions occasioned by decay; from whence to moulder, to waste away: mould, or earth; that to which decay reduces bodies: and a mould, a form to cast metals in. A diversity of pronunciation has endeavoured to distinguish the first of these senses from the rest by sounding it so as to rhyme with bowl'd; but these distinctions of sound under the same spelling ought to be as much as possible avoided. For the reasons, see BOWL.

—nŏ, mŏve, nŏr, nŏt;—tūbe, tŭb, bŭll;—ŏil;—pŏund;—thin, THIS.

☞ The vowel u, in the first syllable of this and similar words, forms a remarkable exception to the shortening power of the antepenultimate and secondary accent; any other vowel but u, unless followed by a diphthong, would have been short. This arises from no regard to the Latin quantity in the word Muculentus, for the u in Culinary, and Mutilate, &c. is long in English, though short in the Latin Culinarius, Mutilo, &c. So that the long u in this and similar words is an idiom of our own pronunciation. (508) (511) (530).

MUCUS, mū'kŭs. s. The viscous substance discharged at the nose; any viscous matter.

MUD, mŭd. s. The slime at the bottom of still water; earth well moistened with water.

MUGGY, mŭg'gė. } a. (383).
MUGGISH, mŭg'gish. } Moist, damp.

☞ It is highly probable that this word is a corruption of Murky, which Johnson and other writers explain by dark, cloudy, &c.; but Skinner tells us it is used in Lincolnshire to signify darkness, accompanied by moisture, the word is generally used to signify a dark, close, warm, and moist state of the air. As this word is not very legitimately derived, it is seldom heard among the learned and polite; but as it affords us a new complex idea, and is in much use among the middle ranks of life, it seems not unworthy of being adopted.

MY, mī, or mē. pron. possessive. Belonging to me.

☞ There is a puzzling diversity to foreigners in the pronunciation of this word, and sometimes to natives, when they read, which ought to be explained. It is certain that the pronoun my, when it is constradistinguished from any other possessive pronoun, and consequently emphatical, is always pronounced with its full, open sound, rhyming with fly; but when there is no such emphasis, it falls exactly into the sound of me, the oblique case of I. Thus if I were to say, My pen is as bad as my paper, I should necessarily pronounce my like me, as in this sentence pen and paper are the emphatical words; but if I were to say, My pen is worse than yours, here my is in opposition to yours, and must, as it is emphatical, be pronounced so as to rhyme with high, nigh, &c.

NARRABLE, nār'rā-bl. a. (81) (405). Capable to be told.

To NARRATE, nār'rāte. v. a. (91). To relate, to tell.

☞ Dr. Johnson says this word is only used in Scotland; but as it is regularly derived from the Latin narro, and has a specific meaning to distinguish it from every other word, it ought to be considered as a necessary part of the language. To tell seems to imply communication in the most general sense: as to tell a story, to tell a secret, &c. To relate, is to tell at some length, and in some order, as to relate the particulars of a transaction; but to narrate seems to relate a transaction in order from beginning to end; which often becomes insipid and tiresome. Hence the beauty of Pope's——narrative old age:

"The poor, the rich, the valiant, and the sage,
"And boasting youth, and narrative old age."

NARRATION, nār-rā'shŭn. s. Account, relation, history.

☞ There is a vulgar pronunciation of this word as if written na-ur, which cannot be too carefully avoided. Some critics have contended, that it ought to be pronounced as if written nate-yure; but this pronunciation comes so near to that here adopted, as scarcely to be distinguished from it. T before y, which is the letter long u begins with (8), approaches so near to sh, as in the absence of accent, naturally to fall into it, in the same manner as s becomes zh in leisure, pleasure, &c. The sibilation and aspiration of t in this and similar words, provided they are not too coarsely pronounced, are so far from being a deformity in our language, by increasing the number of hissing sounds, as some have insinuated, that they are a real beauty; and, by a certain coalescence and flow of sound, contribute greatly to the smoothness and volubility of pronunciation. See Principles, No. 459, 460, 461, &c.

☞ In this word of our own composition from nice, we have unaccountably run into the pronunciation of the mute e. This word we always hear pronounced in three syllables, though safety, ninety, and surety, are ever heard in two. This is a proof how much mere similitude of sound often operates in fixing pronunciation: the termination ty, being almost always preceded by e or i in words of Latin or French formation, where these vowels form a distinct syllable, as variety, gayety, anxiety, society, &c. Words of mere English formation that approach to them are thus carried into the same pronunciation by bare likeness of sound only.

NICHE, nĭtsh. s. (352). A hollow in which a statue may be placed.

NICK, nĭk. s. Exact point of time at which there is necessity or convenience; a notch cut in any thing; a score, a reckoning; a winning throw.

OBDURACY, ôb'jû-râ-sè, or ôb-dû'râ-sè. s. (293) (294). Inflexible wickedness, impenitence, hardness of heart.

☞ W. Johnston and Entick are the only orthöepists who adopt the first mode of accenting this word; while Dr Johnson, Dr. Ash, Mr. Sheridan, Dr. Kenrick, Buchanan, Perry, and Barclay, adopt the last. Mr. Scott adopts both, but seems to give the latter the preference by placing it first. The accentuation of this word must be determined by that of obdurate, from which it is derived. It seems, however, to follow the example of accuracy, procuracy, &c. in throwing the accent on the first syllable. As there are some terminations which seem to attract the accent to the latter syllables, as ator, end, &c. as spectator, observator, &c. comprehend, apprehend, &c. so there are others that seem to repel it to the beginning of the word, as ary, acy, &c. as efficacy, optimacy, contumacy, &c. salutary, tributary, adversary, &c. The word in question seems to be of the latter class, and therefore more analogically pronounced with the accent on the first than on the second syllable. See OBDURATE.

OBDURATE, ôb'jû-râte, or ôb-dû'râte. a. (91) (293) (294) (503). Hard of heart, inflexibly obstinate in ill, hardened; firm, stubborn; harsh, rugged.

☞ This word is pronounced with the accent on the second syllable by Dr. Johnson, Mr. Sheridan, Dr. Kenrick, Dr. Ash, Mr. Nares, Mr Elphinston, Mr. Barclay, Buchanan, and Mr. Perry; and on the first by Bailey, Entick, and W. Johnston. Mr. Scott accents it either on the first or second, but seems to give the preference to the latter. The Poets are decidedly in favour of the penultimate accent; and when the usage of poetry does not contradict any plain analogy of prosaic pronunciation, it certainly has a respectable authority. But the verb to indurate is a word of exactly the same form, and has the same derivation; and yet Dr. Johnson, Mr. Sheridan, Dr. Kenrick, Mr. Scott, W. Johnston, Barclay, and Entick, place the accent on the first syllable: and my observation fails me if there is not a strong propensity in custom to place the accent on the first syllable of the word in question. This propensity, as there is a plain analogy in favour of it, ought, in my opinion, to be indulged. To indurate is a verb derived from the Latin induro, forming its participle in atus; and words of this kind are generally anglicised by the termination ate, and have the accent at least as high as the antepenultimate: thus from depuro, propago, desolo, &c. are formed to depurate, to propagate, to desolate, &c.; and, without recurring to the Latin, indu'atus, we form the regular participle indurated, from the verb to indurate. But though there is the Latin verb obduro, we have not formed an English verb from it in ate as in the former case, but derive the adjective obdurate from the Latin participial adjective obduratus; and no analogy can be more uniform than that of removing the accent two syllables higher than in the original: thus desperate, profligate, and defecate, have the accent on the first syllable: and desperatus, profligatus, defecatus, on the third. Agreeably, therefore, to every analogy of derivation, obdurate ought to have the accent on the first syllable; and as poets have adopted the other accentuation, we must, as in medicinal, and some other words, admit of a poetical and prosaic pronunciation, rather than cross so clear an analogy in favour of poetry, which is so frequently at variance with prose, and sometimes with itself.—See ACADEMY and INCOMPARABLE.

OBDURATELY, ôb'jû-rât-lè. ad. Stubbornly, inflexibly.

OBDURATENESS, ôb'jû-rât-nès. s. Stubbornness, inflexibility, impenitence.

OBDURATION, ôb-jû-râ'shûn. s. Hardness of heart.

OBEDIENCE, ō-bē'jē-ēnse. s. (293) (376). Obsequiousness, submission to authority.

☞ The o which forms the first syllable of this word, though not under the accent, may occasionally be pronounced as long and open as the o in oval, over, &c. (see EFFACE); and though in rapid pronunciation it admits of a short obscure sound, common to some of the other vowels when unaccented, yet its radical sound, or that which it acquires on the least distinctness or solemnity, is undoubtedly the long open o before mentioned. Thus in that fugitive pronunciation which has no existence but in the ear, and can hardly be expressed to the eye by a correspondent sound, we perceive very little difference in the sound of the initial vowels of abound, upbraid, and obedience; yet the moment we dwell with the least distinctness on these letters, the a in abound verges to the a in Father; the u has the short sound we hear on the preposition up; and the o in obedience becomes open, as the first sound of that letter in the alphabet. The same may be observed of the o in opaque, opinion, and every initial o ending a syllable immediately before the accent.—See Principles, No. 98.

OBEDIENT, ō-bē'jē-ēnt. a. Submissive to authority, compliant with command or prohibition, obsequious.

OBEDIENTIAL, ō-bē-jē-ĕn'shāl. a. According to the rule of obedience.

OBEDIENTLY, ō-bē'jē-ēnt-lē. ad. With obedience.

OBEISANCE, ō-bā'sănse. s. (250). A bow, a courtesy, an act of reverence.

☞ I must retract my former pronunciation of this word which made the diphthong ei like e in obedience, and adopt the sound of a as in the ey of obey. For the former sound we have Mr. Sheridan, Dr. Kenrick, and Mr. Perry; and for the latter, Mr. Nares, Mr. Elphinston, Mr. Scott, and W. Johnston. But if the authorities for this pronunciation were less weighty than they are, analogy would be clearly on the side I have adopted, as ei, when under the accent, is much more frequently pronounced like ey in obey than like ey in key: the latter word and ley being the only exceptions to the general rule of pronouncing ey when accented; and these letters we know are perfectly equivalent to ei. OCCASION, ŏk-kā'zhŭn. s. Occurrence, casualty, incident; opportunity, convenience; accidental cause; reason, not cogent, but opportune; incidental need, casual exigence.

☞ What was observed of the e in Efface is applicable to the o in the first syllable of this word. From the tendency of the vowel to open, when immediately preceding the accent, we find elegant speakers sometimes pronounce the o in occasion, offend, officious, &c. as if written o-casion, o-fend, o-ficious, &c. This seems to be one of those "faults true critics dare not "mend." But as it is an evident deviation from the orthography, I have not dared to mark these words in this manner. See EFFACE. It must, however, be remarked, that this deviation only takes place before double c in the word occasion and its compounds.

☞ It is not a little strange that this adjective should have preserved the accent of the simple odour, when the Latin odŏrous presented so fair an opportunity of altering it. Milton has seized this opportunity; but, happily for the analogy of our own language, it has not been followed:

—"Last the bright consummate flow'r
Spirits odorous breathes: flow'rs and their fruit
Man's nourishment."—

Where we may observe, that if the Latin accent be preserved, the Latin spelling ought to be preserved likewise.

☞ All the orthöepists I have consulted (as far as can be gathered from their notation and accentuation) make the penultimate e in this word short, as in the word presence, except Mr. Sheridan. That it is not pronounced enclitically like omnipotence (515) (518), arises, perhaps, from the number of consonants in the latter syllables; and as this is the case, it seems most agreeable to the nature of our composition to pronounce presence in this word, in the same manner as when it is taken singly; just as we pronounce theatre in the word amphitheatre, with the accent on the antepenultimate, though the accent is on the penultimate, and the vowel is long in the Latin amphitheatrum.

OMNIPRESENT, ŏm-nē-prĕz'ĕnt. a. Ubiquitary, present in every place.

ON, ŏn. prep. It is put before the word which signifies that which is under, that by which any thing is supported, which any thing covers, or where any thing is fixed; noting addition or accumulation, as Mischiefs on mischiefs; noting a state of progression, as Whether on thy way? noting dependence or reliance, as On God's providence their hopes depend; at, noting place; it denotes the motive or occasion of any thing; it denotes the time at which any thing happens, as this happened On the first day; in forms of denunciation it is put before the thing threatened; noting invocation; noting stipulation or condition.

ON, ŏn. ad. Forward, in succession; forward, in progression; in continuance, without ceasing; upon the body, as part of dress, it notes resolution to advance.

ON, ŏn. interject. A word of incitement or encouragement.

ONCE, wŭnse. ad. (165). One time; a single time; the same time; one time, though no more; at the time immediate; formerly, at a former time.

ONE, wŭn. a. (165). Less than two, single, denoted by an unit; indefinitely, any; different, diverse, opposed to Another; one of two, opposed to the other; particularly one.

☞ This word and its relatives, once and none, are perhaps the best tests of a residence in the capital. In some parts of England they are pronounced so as to give the o the sound it has in tone, sometimes the sound it has in gone; but the true sound is that it has in son, done, &c. which is perfectly equivalent to the sound of u in sun. I never could make a northern inhabitant of England pronounce the following sentence without the greatest difficulty: "I have won one game, and you "have won one; you have not won once, "and that is wonderful." Where we may observe that the o in won, is the exact sound it has in one, once, and wonderful.

ONE, wŭn. s. A single person; a single mass or aggregate; the first hour; the same thing; a person; a person by way of eminence; a distinct or particular person; persons united; concord, agreement, one mind; any person: any man indefinitely; One has sometimes a plural, when it stands for persons indefinitely, as the great Ones of the world.

ONE-EYED, wŭn'īde. a. (283). Having only one eye.

speech whereby names and words are formed to the resemblance of the sound made by the things signified. This word is formed from the Greek ονομα name, and ποιεω, fingo, I make or feign. Thus is the word triquetrack formed from the noise made by moving the men at this game; and from the same source arises the buzzing of bees, the grunting of hogs, the cackling of hens, the snoring of people asleep, the clashing of arms, &c. The surest etymologies are those derived from the onomatopoeia. Chambers.

☞ Two aspirations in succession, says Mr. Elphinston, seem disagreeable to an English ear, and therefore one of them is generally sunk. Thus diphthong and triphthong are pronounced dipthong and tripthong. P is lost as well as h in apophthegm; and therefore it is no wonder we hear the first h dropped in ophthalmy and ophthalmick, which is the pronunciation I have adopted as agreeable to analogy. Nay, such an aversion do we seem to have to a succession of aspirates, that the h is sunk in Isthmus, Esther, and Demosthenes, because the s, which is akin to the aspiration, immediately precedes. Mr. Sheridan pronounces the first syllable of this word like off, but the first of diphthong and triphthong, like dip and trip. Mr. Scott, W. Johnston, and Mr. Perry, have not got this word, but pronounce diphthong and triphthong in the same manner as Mr. Sheridan. Dr. Kenrick also wants the word; he gives no pronunciation to diphthong, but makes the h silent in triphthong; while Barclay pronounces the h in ophthalmick, but makes it either way in diphthong, and silent in triphthong. It may be remarked, that Dr. Jones, who wrote a Spelling Dictionary in Queen Anne's time, makes the h in these two words silent.

OPTATIVE, ŏp'tă-tĭv, or ŏp-tā'tĭv. a. (505). Expressive of desire; the name of that mood of a verb which expresses desire.

☞ Dr. Johnson, Mr. Sheridan, Dr. Ash, Mr. Scott, Entick, Barclay, and Buchanan, accent this word on the first syllable; and Dr. Kenrick, Bailey, W. Johnston, and Mr. Perry on the second. That the last is more general, particularly in Grammar schools, will be readily acknowledged; but that the first is more correct and agreeable to analogy, cannot be denied: for this word is not so naturally derived from the classical optatus, as the lower Latin optativus: and why this word should transfer its penultimate accent to the first syllable of the English word, may be seen under the words ACADEMY, INCOMPARABLE, &c.

OPTICAL, ŏp'tē-kăl. s. (88). Relating to the science of opticks.

ORATOR, ôr'râ-tûr. s. (503). A publick speaker, a man of eloquence; petitioner. This sense is used in addresses to chancery.

ORATORIAL, ôr-â-tô'rê-âl. a. Rhetorical, florid.

☞ I have inserted this word, though omitted by almost all our lexicographers, because I have met with it in authors of reputation. Dr. Foster, in his Treatise on Accent and Quantity, says: "The connexion of this, which may be called the "oratorial accent, with the syllable, and "the subordination of them to each other, "however difficult it may appear, is yet "easy in practice." page 23. Other good authorities for this word might have been adduced, but the other adjective oratorical, though not so justly formed, seems generally to be preferred. I have sometimes made the experiment on people, whose ears were nicely set to pure English pronunciation, by proposing to them for their choice the adjectives oratorial or oratorical, and have always found them prefer the latter. This may, in some measure, arise from supposing the former might be considered as the adjective of oratorio, but seems rather to be occasioned by too great a plenitude and rotundity of sound, which is not agreeable to the genius of our language: for if we regard derivation only, the adjective ought to be oratorial, as derived immediately from the Latin oratorius, in the same manner as from rhetoricus, is formed rhetorical.

ORATORICAL, ôr-râ-tôr'rê-kâl. a. Rhetorical, befitting an orator.

ORATORIO, ôr-râ-tô'rê-ô. s. An Italian word, used to signify a kind of sacred drama, generally taken from the Scriptures, and set to musick.

ORATORY, ôr'râ-tûr-ê. s. (557). Eloquence, rhétorical skill; exercise of eloquence; a private place which is deputed and allotted for prayer alone.

ORB, ôrb. s. Sphere, orbicular body, circular body; mundane sphere, celestial body; wheel; any rolling body; circle, line drawn round; circle described by any of the mundane sphere; period, revolution of time; sphere of action.

ORBATION, ôr-bâ'shûn. s. Privation of parents or children.

ORBED, { ôr'bêd. / ôrb'd. } a. (359). Round, circular, orbicular; formed into a circle; rounded.

ORBITY, ôr'bê-tê. s. Loss, or want of parents or children.

ORC, ôrk. s. A sort of sea-fish.

ORCHAL, ôr'kâl. s. (88). A stone from which a blue colour is made.

ORCHANET, ôr'kâ-nêt. s. An herb.

ORCHARD, ôr'tshûrd. s. (88). A garden of fruit-trees.

ORCHESTRE, ôr'kês-tûr. s. (416). The place where the musicians are set at a publick show.

☞ This word is accented on the first syllable by Dr. Johnson, Mr. Sheridan, Dr. Ash, Mr. Scott, Mr. Nares, Buchanan, Entick, Perry, and Barclay; and by Mr. Bailey and W. Johnston on the second; and by Dr. Kenrick on either. The first mode has not only the majority of votes in its favour, but is agreeable to the general analogy of words of three syllables, which when not of our own formation, commonly adopt the antepenultimate accent. The exception to this rule will be found under the next word.

ORCHESTRA, ôr-kês'trâ. (503). A part of the theatre appropriated to the musicians.

☞ Dr. Johnson has preferred the French orchestre, to the Latin orchestra, and the Greek ὀρχήστρα; but as we find the latter spelling and pronunciation universally adopted; and as we take almost every other term of art rather from the Greek than any other language, I have ventured to insert it in that dress, after Chambers, and some other very respectable authors.

This word is accented on the first syllable by Dr. Ash, Mr. Scott, Mr. Perry, Entick, and Barclay; but Mr. Nares says it is accented on the second, as I have given it. For notwithstanding the numbers against me, the very general rule is on my side; which is, that when we adopt a word whole from the Latin or Greek, it ought to have the same accent as in those languages. See principles, No. 503.

ORIGINATION, ô-rîd-jè-nâ'shûn. s. The act of bringing into existence.

ORISON, ôr'rè-zûn. s. (168). A prayer, a supplication.

☞ Mr. Sheridan has adopted the other spelling from the French oraison; but Dr. Johnson and all the writers he quotes, spell the word in the manner I have done. Dr. Johnson tells us this word is variously accented; that Shakespeare has the accent both on the first and second syllables, Milton and Crashaw on the first, and others on the second.

"The fair Ophelia! Nymph in thy orisons,
"Be all my sins remembered."——
Hamlet.

"Alas! your too much love and care for me
"Are heavy orisons 'gainst this poor
"wretch." Henry the Fifth.

"My wakeful lay shall knock
"At th' oriental gates, and duly mock
"The early larks shrill orisons to be
"An anthem at the day's nativity."—— Crashaw.

"His daily orisons attract our ears."——
Sandys.

"Lowly they bow'd adoring and began
"Their orisons each morning duly paid."
Milton.

"So he went on with his orisons;
"Which if you mark them well, were wise

"Here at the dead of night,
"The hermit oft 'midst his orisons hears
"Agast the voice of time disparting tow'rs."
Dyer.

"The midnight clock attests my fervent
"pray'rs,
"The rising sun my orisons declares."——
Harte.

Mr. Nares tells us he has no doubt that Milton's accentuation is right. This too is my opinion. Poets are not the best authorities, even when they are unanimous; but much worse when they differ from others, and even from themselves. We must therefore leave them the liberty of accenting both ways, either for the sake of the verse, the rhyme, the humour, or the affectation of singularity, and bring our reason for accenting this word in prose on the first syllable, from the very general rule in Principles, No. 503. Accordingly Mr. Elphinston, Mr. Sheridan, Mr. Scott, Dr. Kenrick, Buchanan, W. Johnston, Barclay, Bailey, Perry, and Entick, uniformly place the accent on the first syllable; and Dr. Ash says it is sometimes accented on the second.

To PAGE, pādje. v. a. To mark the pages of a book; to attend as a page. In this last sense not used.

PAGEANT, pād'jŭnt. s. (244). A statue in a show; any show, a spectacle of entertainment.

☞ Mr. Perry, Buchanan, and Entick, pronounce the a in the first syllable long, like that in page; but Mr. Sheridan, Dr. Kenrick, Mr. Scott, and Mr. Nares, made it short, as in pad; that the first is more analogical is evident, as the accented a is succeeded by the diphthong ea (505); but that the last is more agreeable to general usage, I have not the least doubt. The same reason holds good for the first a in pageantry; but usage is still more decidedly for the short sound in this word, than in pageant. Mr. Sheridan, Dr. Kenrick, Mr. Perry, and W. Johnston, adopt the short sound, and Entick alone the long one. About forty years ago, when Mr. Garrick exhibited a show in honour of Shakespeare, it was universally called a Pad-junt.

PAGEANT, pād'jŭnt. a. Showy, pompous, ostentatious.

PALFREY, păl'frē, or pāl'frē. s. A small horse fit for ladies.

☞ In the first edition of this Dictionary I followed Mr. Sheridan, W. Johnston, Mr. Perry, and Buchanan, in the sound of a in the first syllable of this word; but, upon maturer consideration, think Dr. Kenrick, Mr. Scott, and Mr. Barclay, more analogical, and must therefore give the third sound of a the preference.—See Principles, No. 84.

PALINDROME, păl'lĭn-drōme. s. A word or sentence which is the same read backward or forward.

☞ I have not found this word in any of our Dictionaries, but have met with it in so respectable a writer, that I cannot resist the temptation of inserting it here, especially as it serves to fill up a niche in language, which, I think, never should be empty: I mean, that wherever there is a noun established, there should always be a verb to correspond to it. The passage from which I have taken this word has so much real good sense, and such true genuine humour, that I cannot refrain from extracting the whole paragraph, and relying on the pardon of the inspector for the digression. —"It may be thought ridiculous to assert, "that morals have any connexion with "purity of language, or that the precision "of truth may be violated through defect "of critical exactness in the three degrees "of comparison; yet how frequently do "we hear, from the dealers in superlatives, "of most admirable, super-excellent, and "quite peefect people, who, to plain persons, "not bred in the school of exaggeration, "would appear mere common characters, "not rising above the level of mediocrity! "By this negligence in the just application "of words, we shall be as much misled by "these trope and figure ladies when they "degrade, as when they panegyrize; for, "to a plain and sober judgement, a trades-"man may not be the most good-for-nothing "fellow that ever existed, merely because "it was impossible for him to execute, in "an hour, an order which required a week; "a lady may not be the most hideous fright "the world ever saw, though the make of "her gown may have been obsolete for a "month; nor may one's young friend's "father be a monster of cruelty, though he "may be a quiet gentleman, who does not "choose to live at watering-places, but "likes to have his daughter stay at home "with him in the country."—Hannah More's Strictures on Modern Female Education, vol. i. page 216. If the usage of this word stood in need of farther support, we have it from the best authority. The author thinks it superfluous to panegyrize truth: yet, in favour of sound and rational rules (which must be founded in truth, or they are good for nothing), he ventures to quote the Stagirite himself: "It is not "possible for a true opinion to be contrary "to another true one."—Harris's Philological Inquiries.

PAPILLARY, pāp'pĭl-lā-rē. a. Having emulgent vessels, or resemblances of paps.

☞ There is a set of words of similar derivation and termination, which must be necessarily accented in the same way: these are Axillary, Maxillary, Capillary, Papillary, Pupillary, Armillary, Mammillary, and Medullary. All these, except the last, which was not inserted, I had accented on the first syllable in a Rhyming and Pronouncing Dictionary published thirty years ago.

This accentuation I still think the most agreeable to analogy; and that the inspector may judge of the usage, I have subjoined the several different modes of accentuation of the different orthoepists:

Axillary,	Johnson, Kenrick.
Axillary,	Sheridan, Ash, Bailey.
Maxillary,	Johnson, Sheridan, Barclay.
Maxillary,	Ash, Kenrick, W. Johnston, Bailey, Entick.
Capillary,	Johnson, Kenrick, Nares, Fenning.
Capillary,	Sheridan, Ash, W. Johnston, Perry, Buchanan, Bailey, Entick.
Papillary,	Johnson, Nares, Barclay, Fenning.
Papillary,	Sheridan, Kenrick, Ash,
Pulpillary,	Johnson, Sheridan, Kenrick, Ash, Scott, Perry, Entick, Barclay, Fenning.
Pupillary,	No examples.
Mammillary,	Nares, Bailey.
Mammillary,	Johnson, Kenrick, Ash, Sheridan, Scott, Perry, Entick.
Armillary,	Sheridan, Scott, Nares, Smith, Fenning.
Armillary,	Ash, Perry, Entick, Bailey, Barclay.
Medullary.	No examples.
Medullary,	Johnson, Sheridan, Ash, Kenrick, W. Johnston, Buchanan, Bailey, Barclay, Fenning, Entick.

This extract sufficiently shows how uncertain usage is, and the necessity of recurring to principles: and that these are on the side I have adopted, may be gathered from No. 512.—See MAMMILLARY and MAXILLARY.

PAPILLOUS, pā-pĭl'lŭs. The same with PAPILLARY.

☞ There is some diversity in the accentuation of this word, as well as the former: Dr. Johnson and Barclay place the accent on the first syllable; and Mr. Sheridan, Dr. Kenrick, Dr. Ash, and Mr. Perry, on the second, as I have done.

to entitle it to a place in the Dictionaries of our language, as it not only more forcibly expresses the common idea than to enervate or to deaden, but serves to fill up those vacancies in speech, where there is no verb to correspond to a substantive or adjective. Hence Pope's happy coinage of the verb to sensualize.—See the verb to PANEGYRIZE.—A happier instance of the use of this word, and a better authority for it, cannot be given than in Hannah More's Strictures on Education, vol. i. page 49, where, speaking of the philosophic and systematic vice of modern infidels on the Continent, she says: "This "cool, calculating, intellectual wickedness, "eats out the very heart and core of vir- "tue, and, like a deadly mildew, blights "and shrivels the blooming promise of the "human spring. Its benumbing touch com- "municates a torpid sluggishness, which "paralyzes the soul. It descants on de- "pravity, and details its grossest acts as "frigidly as if its object were to allay the "tumult of the passions, while it is let- "ting them loose on mankind, by pluck- "ing off the muzzle of present restraint "and future accountableness."

☞ Dr. Johnson, in the folio edition of his Dictionary, places the accent on the penultimate syllable of this word, and Mr. Sheridan and Mr. Nares on the antepenultimate, and the latter make the e long. Dr. Johnson has several words of a similar termination for his accentuation; but analogy is clearer for Mr. Sheridan and Mr. Nares with respect to accent, and directly against them with respect to quantity; for it is not the long quantity of the original that can resist the shortening power of the English antepenultimate accent in this word, any more than in Diæresis, Ephemeris, &c. which see.

PARENT, pâ'rênt. s. A father or mother.

PAROTID, pā-rŏt'tĭd. a. (503). Belonging to the glands under and behind the ear.

☞ In this, and the following word, Dr. Johnson places the accent on the antepenultimate syllable, but Mr. Sheridan and Dr. Ash much more properly on the penultimate, as here marked. It may, however, be observed, that Dr. Johnson's accentuation of this word is the most agreeable to analogy, as it comes from the Latin Parotides, which, according to the general rule, by losing a syllable, has its accent removed a syllable higher (see ACADEMY); but the succeeding word, Parotis, is a perfect Latin word, and therefore preserves its Latin accent on the penultimate.—See Principles, (No. 503, b,) and the word IRREPARABLE.

PAROTIS, pā-rō'tĭs. s. (503). A tumour in the glandules behind and about the ears.

PAROXYSM, pār'ŏk-sĭzm. s. (503). A fit, periodical exacerbation of a disease.

PARSON, pār's'n. s. (170). The priest of a parish, one that has a parochial charge or cure of souls; a clergyman; it is applied to the teachers of the Presbyterians.

☞ The o before n, preceded by k, p, s, or t, is under the same predicament as e; that is, when the accent is not on it, the two consonants unite, and the vowel is suppressed; as beckon, capon, season, mutton, &c. pronounced beck'n, cap'n, seas'n, mutt'n, &c. Parson, therefore, ought to be pronounced with the o suppressed, and not as Mr. Sheridan has marked it. See Principles, No. 103, 170.

PARSONAGE, pār's'n-ăge. s. (90). The benefice of a parish.

PARTICULARLY, pär-tik'ù-lŭr-lé. ad. Distinctly, singly, not universally; in an extraordinary degree.

PARTISAN, pär'té-zăn. s. (524). A kind of pike or halberd; an adherent to a faction; the commander of a party.

☞ All our orthoëpists agree in accenting this word on the first syllable. Mr. Nares says, Dr. Johnson has improperly accented this word on the last; but, both in the folio edition of his Dictionary, and the quarto, printed since his death, the accent is on the first. There is not the same uniformity in the accentuation of the companion to this word artisan; for though Mr. Nares, Mr. Perry, Dr. Ash, W. Johnston, Buchanan, Bailey, Fenning, and Entick, accent the first syllable, Dr. Johnson, in both editions of his Dictionary, Mr. Sheridan, Mr. Scott, and Mr. Barclay, accent the last: and Dr Kenrick places an accent on both first and last. The same diversity appears in the accentuation of courtesan, a word of exactly the same form; which is accented by Mr. Sheridan, Mr. Scott, W. Johnston, Mr. Nares, Fenning, and Entick, on the last syllable; and by Dr. Ash, Dr. Kenrick, Buchanan, Barclay, Bailey, and Fenning, on the first; and by Mr. Perry both on the first and last. The truth is, these three words are among those which admit of the accent either on the first or last syllable, and this has produced the diversity we find in our Dictionaries (524). The accent on the first syllable seems the most agreeable to our own analogy, and ought to be preferred (503).

PARTITION, pär-tish'ŭn. s. The act of dividing, a state of being divided; division, separation, distinction; part divided from the rest, separate part; that by which different parts are separated; part where separation is made.

PASSPORT, pâs'pōrt. s. Permission of egress.

PAST, pâst. part. a.; properly passed. See Principles, No. 367. Not present, not to come; spent, gone through, undergone.

☞ This contraction, in every word but the preposition, is a disgrace to our orthography. It took its rise, in all probability, from words ending in st, with which it was rhymed, as that of Pope:

"Which not alone has shone on ages past,
"But lights the present, and shall warm the "last."

But as we see that possest, drest, and many others, spelled in this manner to accommodate rhymes to the eye merely, have recovered their true form; there is no reason why this word should not do the same.

☞ This word, when an adjective, is, by Dr. Kenrick, W. Johnston, and Buchanan, pronounced with the a long as in paper; but by Mr. Sheridan, Mr. Scott, Dr. Ash, Mr. Perry, and Entick, short, as in pat. But when the word is a substantive, it is pronounced with the a short by Mr Nares and all those orthoepists, except Buchanan. That the adjective should by some be pronounced with the a long, as a remnant of that analogy which ought to prevail in all words of this kind (544); but the uniformity with which the substantive is pronounced, with the a short, precludes all hope of alteration.

PATHETICAL, pă-*th*ĕt'tĕ-kăl. } a.
PATHETICK, pă-*th*ĕt'tĭk. (509). }
Affecting the passions, passionate, moving.

PATHETICALLY, pă-*th*ĕt'tĕ-kăl-ē. ad. In such a manner as may strike the passions.

PATHETICALNESS, pă-*th*ĕt'tĕ-kăl-nĕs. s. Quality of being pathetick, quality of moving the passions.

PATHLESS, pă*th*'lĕs. a. Untrodden, not marked with paths.

PATHOGNOMONICK, pă-*th*ŏg'nō-mŏn'ĭk. a. (509). Such signs of a disease as are inseparable, designing the essence or real nature of the disease; not symptomatick.

☞ Mr. Sheridan has suppressed the g in this word as in gnomon, without considering, that when a syllable precedes, the g unites with it, and is to be pronounced. Thus this letter is mute in sign, but pronounced in signify. The same may be observed of resign and resignation; indign and indignity, &c.

PATHOLOGICAL, pă*th*-ō-lŏj'ĕ-kăl. a. Relating to the tokens or discoverable effects of a distemper.

PATHOLOGIST, pă-*th*ŏl'ō-jĭst. s. One who treats of pathology.

PATHOLOGY, pă-*th*ŏl'ō-jē. s. (518). That part of medicine which relates to the distempers, with their differences, causes and effects incident to the human body.

PATHWAY, pă*th*'wā. s. A road, strictly a narrow way to be passed on foot.

PATIBULARY, pă-tĭb'bū-lă-rē. a. Belonging to the gallows.

PATIENCE, pā'shĕnse. s. The power of suffering, indurance, the power of expecting long without rage or discontent, the power of supporting injuries without revenge: sufferance, permission; an herb.

PATIENT, pā'shēnt. a. (163). Having the quality of enduring; calm under pain or affliction; not revengeful against injuries, not easily provoked; not hasty, not viciously eager or impetuous.

PATIENT, pā'shēnt. s. That which receives impressions from external agents; a person diseased.

PATIENTLY, pā'shēnt-lé. ad. Without rage under pain or affliction; without vicious impetuosity.

PATINE, pāt'tēn. s. (140). The cover of a chalice.

PATLY, pāt'lé. ad. Commodiously, fitly.

PATRIARCH, pā'trē-ārk. s. (534) (353). One who governs by paternal right, the father and ruler of a family; a bishop superiour to archbishops.

PATRIARCHAL, pā-trē-ār'kāl. a. Belonging to patriarchs, such as was possessed or enjoyed by patriarchs; belonging to hierarchical patriarchs.

PATRIARCHATE, pā-trē-ār'kāt. (91).
PATRIARCHSHIP, pā'trē-ārk-ship. s. A bishoprick superiour to archbishopricks.

PATRIARCHY, pā'trē-ār-kē. s. (505). Jurisdiction of a patriarch, patriarchate.

PATRICIAN, pā-trish'ān. a. Senatorial, noble, not plebeian.

PATRICIAN, pā-trish-ān. s. A nobleman among the Romans.

PATRIMONIAL, pāt-trē-mō'nē-āl. a. Possessed by inheritance.

PATRIMONY, pāt'trē-mūn-nē. s. An estate possessed by inheritance.

☞ For the o, see DOMESTICK.

PATRIOT, pā'trē-ūt. s. (505) (534). One whose ruling passion is the love of his country.

PATRIOTISM, pā'trē-ūt-izm. s. (166). Love of one's country, zeal for one's country.

PATROL, pā-trōle'. s. The act of going the rounds of a garrison to observe that orders are kept; those that go the rounds.

☞ All our orthöepists give this word, both as noun and verb, the accent on the last syllable, except Mr. Nares, who wishes to reduce it to the accentual distinction so often observed (493). Johnson's folio edition has the accent of both words on the first, but the quarto accents both on the last; and this accentuation, it is certain, is the most received among the polite world.

To PATROL, pā-trōle'. v. n. To go the rounds in a camp or garrison.

PATRON, pā'trūn. s. (166). One who countenances, supports, or protects; a guardian saint; advocate, defender, vindicator; one who has donation of ecclesiastical preferment.

PATRONAGE, pāt'trūn-ādje. s. (90). Support, protection; guardianship of saints; donation of a benefice, right of conferring a benefice.

☞ That the first syllable of this word is short, and that of patron long, is owing to the shortening power of the antepenultimate accent (503).

PATRONAL, pāt'trō-nāl. a. Protecting, supporting, guarding, defending.

☞ This word, like Matronal, has a diversity of pronunciation in our Dictionaries, which shows the necessity of recurring to principles in order to fix its true sound. Buchanan places the accent on the first syllable; but whether he makes the a long or short cannot be known. Dr. Ash places the accent on the same syllable; and though he makes the a in Matronal short, yet he makes the same letter in this word long as in Patron. Barclay, and Fenning lay the stress upon the first of Matronal, and on the second of Patronal: Perry and Entick place the accent on the first of both these words, but make the a in Matronal long, and the same letter in Patronal short. Bailey accents the second syllable of this word.

PATRONESS, pā'trūn-ēs. s. A female that defends, countenances, or supports; a female guardian saint.

☞ I am well aware of the shortening power of the antepenultimate accent in Patronage, Patronise, &c. but cannot, as Mr. Sheridan, Mr. Scott, W. Johnston, Dr. Kenrick, and Mr. Perry, have done, allow it that power in Patroness, because the feminine termination ess is as much a subjunctive of our own as the participial terminations ing or ed, or the plural number, and therefore never ought to alter the accent or quantity of the original word.—See Principles, No. 386, 499.

To PATRONISE, pāt'trō-nize. v. a. (503). To protect, to support, to defend, to countenance.

PATRONYMICK, pāt-trō-nim'mik. s. (509) (530). Expressing the name of the father or ancestor.

PAYDAY, pâ'dâ. s. Day on which debts are to be discharged or wages paid.

PAYER, pâ'ûr. s. (98). One that pays.

PAYMASTER, pâ'mâs-tûr. s. One who is to pay, one from whom wages or reward is received.

PAYMENT, pâ'mĕnt. s. The act of paying; the discharge of debt or promise: a reward; chastisement, sound beating.

PEA, pē. s. (227). A well-known kind of pulse.

☞ When the plural of this word signifies merely number, it is formed, by adding s, as "They are as like as two peas." When quantity is implied e is added to a, as "A "bushel of pease." The pronunciation, in both cases, is exactly the same; that is, as if written peze.

PEACE, pēse. s. (227). Respite from war; quiet from suits or disturbances; rest from any commotion; reconciliation of differences; a state not hostile; rest, freedom from terror, heavenly rest; silence, suppression of the thoughts.

PEACE, pēse. interject. A word commanding silence.

PEDAL, pē'dăl. a. Belonging to a foot.

PEDALS, pĕd'dălz, or pē'dălz. s. The large pipes of an organ.

☞ I have no doubt that Mr. Nares and Entick, who adopt the first pronunciation, have the best usage on their sides; but am persuaded that Mr. Sheridan, Mr. Scott, Buchanan, and Perry, who adopt the last, are more analogical. See Principles, No. 548.

PEDANEOUS, pē-dā'nē-ŭs. a. Going on foot.

PEDANT, pĕd'dănt. s. (88). A schoolmaster; a man vain of low knowledge.

PEDANTICK, pē-dăn'tĭk. } a. Awkwardly ostentatious of learning.

PEDLER, pĕd'lŭr. s. properly Peddler. One who travels the country with small commodities, contracted from petty dealer.

☞ There is the same impropriety in spelling this word with one d only as there would be in spelling saddler and fiddler in the same manner.—For the reasons, see CODLE.

PEDLERY, pĕd'lŭr-ē. a. (98). Wares sold by peddlers.

PEDDLING, pĕd'dl-ĭng. a. (410). Petty dealing, such as peddlers have.

☞ The spelling of this word might have informed Dr. Johnson of the true spelling of Pedler.

PEDOBAPTISM, pēd-dō-băp'tĭzm. s. Infant baptism.

☞ I have differed from Mr. Sheridan and several of our orthöepists in making the first syllable of this word short. I am authorised by the shortening power of the secondary accent (530) notwithstanding the diphthong in the original, which has no more influence in this word than in Cæsarea, oeconomick, and a thousand others.

PEDOBAPTIST, pēd-dō-băp'tĭst. s. One that holds or practices infant baptism.

☞ Mr. Nares tells us that this word throws the accent back to the fourth syllable from the end, though the derivation demands it otherwise. I am sorry to differ from so judicious an orthoepist; but cannot conceive that derivation requires the same accent as on durable, since this word is, like many others, considered as a simple derived from the Latin perdurabilis, which, though not a classical word, is formed in the Latin analogy, and has the same effect on English pronunciation as if it came to us whole; which effect is to place the accent in the anglicised word on that syllable which had a secondary accent in Latin, and that is the first. See ACADEMY and INCOMPARABLE.

The reason why such a formative as perdurabilis may be admitted as the parent of perdurable, and not interferio that of interference, is, that we form interference from the verb to interfere, rather than from interfero, which is not a Latin word, though perhaps in the Latin analogy of formation; but we have no verb to perdure from whence to form perdurable, and therefore allowably follow the Latin analogy of formation, and the English analogy of pronouncing such formatives.—See INTERFERENCE. Poetical authorities are decidedly in favour of this accentuation.

"O perdurable shame! let's stab ourselves."
Shakespeare.

"————the vig'rous sweat
"Doth lend the lively springs their perdura-
"ble heat." Drayton.

"Why would he, for the momentary trick,
"Be perdurably fin'd?"————Shakespeare.

PERDURABLY, pĕr'dū-rā-blĕ. ad. Lastingly.

PERDURATION, pĕr-dū-rā'shŭn. s. Long continuance.

To PEREGRINATE, pĕr'rĕ-grĕ-nāte. v. n. To travel, to live in foreign countries.

PEREGRINATION, pĕr-rĕ-grĕ-nā'shŭn. s. Travel, abode in foreign countries.

PEREGRINE, pĕr'rĕ-grĭn. a. (150). Foreign, not native, not domestick.

To PEREMPT, pĕr-ĕmt'. v. a. To kill, to crush. A law term.

PEREMPTION, pĕr-ĕm'shŭn. s. Crush, extinction. Law term.

PEREMPTORILY, pĕr'rĕm-tŭr-rĕ-lĕ. ad. Absolutely, positively, so as to cut off all farther debate.

PEREMPTORINESS, pĕr'rĕm-tŭr-ĕ-nĕs. s. (412). Positiveness, absolute decision, dogmatism.

PEREMPTORY, pĕr'rĕm-tŭr-ĕ, or pĕr-ĕm'tŭ-rĕ. a. (512). Dogmatical, absolute, such as destroys all farther expostulation.—For the o, see DOMESTICK.

☞ If we consult our orthoepists, there can scarcely be any two pronunciations more equally balanced than those that are given to this word. Mr. Sheridan, Mr. Nares, Mr. Smith, Dr. Ash, W. Johnston, Mr. Scott, and Entick, are for the first; and Dr. Johnson, Dr. Kenrick, Bailey, Buchanan, Barclay, Fenning, and Perry, for the last; but notwithstanding the last has these authorities to support it, I am much mistaken if the first has not obtained a complete victory. That there is a strong tendency in words of this kind to draw the accent high, is evident; it is as evident likewise, that those polysyllables, which we derive from the Latin, incline to accent that syllable on which we place a secondary accent in pronouncing the original, (see ACADEMY and DISPUTABLE;) and provided there are no clusters of unconsonable consonants in the latter syllables, there is no reason why this accentuation should be checked. This is the case with the word in question; the p is mute, t is easily pronounced after em, and the whole termination is sufficiently smooth and voluble: but in Perfunctory the case is different; the uncombinable consonants net are not to be pronounced without considerable difficulty, if we place the accent on the first syllable; and therefore this accentuation ought to be avoided as much as in Corruptible, which see. The Poets incline to the side I have adopted:

"To-morrow be in readiness to go;
"Excuse it not, for I am peremptory."
Shakespeare.

"If I entertaine

PERFORATOR, pĕr'fo-rā-tŭr. s. (521). the instrument of boring.

PERFORCE, pĕr-fōrse'. ad. By violence, violently.

To PERFORM, pĕr-fōrm', or pĕr-fōrm'. v. a. To execute, to do, to discharge, to achieve an undertaking.

☞ There is a wanton deviation from rule in the pronunciation of this word and its derivatives, which calls aloud for reformation. Pronouncing the last syllable like form, a seat, is a gross departure from analogy; as will appear by comparing it with the same syllable in reform, conform, inform, deform, transform, &c. This errour seems chiefly confined to the stage, where it probably originated. It is not unlikely that some affected actor, to give the word a foreign air, first pronounced it in this manner; though, in justice to the stage, it ought to be observed, that it has less of this affectation than any theatre of elocution in the kingdom.

To PERFORM, pĕr-fōrm'. v. n. To succeed in an attempt.

PERFORMABLE, pĕr-fōrm'ă-bl. a. Practicable, such as may be done.

PERFORMANCE, pĕr-fōr'mans. s. Completion of something designed, execution of something promised; composition, work; action, something done.

PERFUME, pĕr'fūme. s. (492). Strong odour of sweetness used to give scents to other things; sweet odour, fragrance.

☞ Fenning, Perry, Entick, Dr. Johnson, Buchanan, W. Johnston, and Kenrick, place the accent on the last syllable of this word either when a substantive or a verb. As a substantive, Scott places the accent either on the first or last, and Sheridan on the first. Mr. Nares has shown at large, that the poets accent the substantive both ways; but the analogy of dissyllable nouns and verbs seems now to have fixed the accent of the substantive on the first, and that of the verb on the last.

(559).—Fāte, fār, fāll, fāt;—mē, mēt;—pīne, pĭn;—

To PERFUME, pĕr-fūme'. v. a. To scent, to impregnate with sweet scent.

PERFUMER, pĕr-fū'mŭr. s. (98). One whose trade is to sell things made to gratify the scent.

PERFUNCTORILY, pĕr-fŭnk'tŭr-rē-lē. ad. Carelessly, negligently.

PERFUNCTORY, pĕr-fŭnk'tŭr-ē. a. Slight, careless, negligent.

☞ I have differed from Mr. Sheridan and W. Johnston, who accent this word on the first syllable; but have Dr. Johnson, Dr. Ash, Mr. Nares, Barclay, Fenning, Bailey, Buchanan, and Entick, on my side for accenting the second: and this pronunciation, without any authority, would be more eligible than the other, from the difficulty of pronouncing the uncombinable consonants in the last syllables without the assistance of accent, especially when we consider that the adverb perfunctorily and the possible abstract noun perfunctoriness must have the same accent as the adjective.—See PEREMPTORY, IRREFRAGABLE and CORRUPTIBLE.

To PERFUSE, pĕr-fūze'. v. a. (437). To tincture, to overspread.

PERHAPS, pĕr-hăps'. ad. Peradventure, it may be.

PERPETUITY, pĕr-pē-tū'ē-tē. s. Duration to all futurity; exemption from intermission or cessation; something of which there is no end.

☞ For the reason why the t is not aspirated in this word, see FUTURITY.

To PERPLEX, pĕr-plĕks'. v. a. To disturb with doubtful notions, to entangle; to embarrass, to make intricate.

PERPLEXEDLY, pĕr-plĕks'ĕd-lē. ad. (364). Intricately, with involution.

PERPLEXEDNESS, pĕr-plĕks'ĕd-nĕs. s. (365). Embarrassment, anxiety; intricacy, involution, difficulty.

PERPLEXITY, pĕr-plĕks'ē-tē. s. Anxiety, distraction of mind; entanglement, intricacy.

PERPOTATION, pĕr-pō-tā'shŭn. s. The act of drinking largely.

PERQUISITE, pĕr'kwĭz-ĭt. s. (156). Something gained by a place or office over and above the settled wages.

PERQUISITION, pĕr-kwē-zĭsh'ŭn. s. An accurate inquiry, a thorough search.

PERRY, pĕr'rē. s. Cyder made of pears.

To PERSECUTE, pĕr'sē-kūte. v. a. To harass with penalties, to pursue with malignity; to pursue with repeated acts of vengeance or enmity; to importune much.

PERSECUTION, pĕr-sē-kū'shŭn. s. The act or practice of persecuting; the state of being persecuted.

PERSECUTOR, pĕr'sē-kū-tŭr. s. (98). One who harasses others with continued malignity.

PERSEVERANCE, pĕr-sē-vē'rānse. s. Persistance in any design or attempt, steadiness in pursuits, constancy in progress.

PERSEVERANT, pĕr-sē-vē'rānt. a. Persisting, constant.

To PERSEVERE, pĕr-sē-vēre'. v. n. To persist in an attempt, not to give over, not to quit the design.

☞ Mr. Nares observes, that this word was anciently written persever, and accented on the second syllable.

" ——— say thou art mine,
" My love, as it begins, so shall persever."
All's well, &c. Act IV.

" Persever not, but hear me, mighty kings."
King John, Act II.

" But in her pride she doth persever still."
Spencer.

But that before the time of Milton the spelling and accentuation had been changed.

" Whence heavy persecution shall arise
" Of all who in the worship persevere
" Of spirit and truth."—
Par. Lost, xii. v. 532.

As this word is written at present, there can be no doubt of its pronunciation; and that it is very properly written so, appears from other words of the same form. Declare, respire, explore, procure, &c. from declaro, respiro, exploro, procuro, &c. and consequently from persevero ought to be formed persevere: not one of our orthoepists place the accent on the second syllable; yet such is the force of prescription, that the old pronunciation is not entirely rooted out, especially in Ireland, where this pronunciation is still prevalent.

PERSEVERINGLY, pĕr-sē-vēre'ĭng-lē. ad. With perseverance.

To PERSIST, pĕr-sĭst'. v. n. (447). To persevere, to continue firm, not to give over.

PERSISTANCE, pĕr-sĭs'tānse. } s. The PERSISTENCY, pĕr-sĭs'tĕn-sē. } state of persisting, steadiness, constancy, perseverance in good or bad; obstinacy, contumacy.

PERSISTIVE, pĕr-sĭs'tĭv. a. (157). Steady, not receding from a purpose, persevering.

PERSON, pĕr's'n. s. (170). Individual or particular man or woman; human being; a general loose term for a human being; one's self, not a representative; exterior appearance; man or woman represented in a fictitious dialogue; character; character of office; in Grammar, the quality of the noun that modifies the verb.—See PARSON.

PERSONABLE, pĕr'sŭn-â-bl. a. Handsome, graceful, of good appearance.

☞ As the o in person is sunk, as in season, treason, &c. so this word being a compound of our own, and personage coming to us from the French, we generally suppress the o; but as personal, personate, &c. come to us from the Latin, we generally preserve the o. This is the best reason I can give for the slight difference we find in the pronunciation of these words; and if any one is inclined to think we ought to preserve the o distinctly in all of them, except person, and even in this, on solemn occasions, I have not the least objection.

PERSONAGE, pĕr'sŭn-ĭdje. s. (90). A considerable person, man or woman of eminence; exterior appearance; air, stature; character assumed; character represented.

PERSONAL, pĕr'sŭn-ăl. a. (88). Belonging to men or women, not to things, not real; affecting individuals or particular people, peculiar, proper to him or her, relating to one's private actions or character; present, not acting by representative; exterior, corporal; in Law, something moveable, something appendant to the person; in Grammar, a personal verb is that which has all the regular modifications of the three persons, opposed to impersonal that has only the third.

PERSONALITY, pĕr-sŏ-năl'ĭ-tê. s. The existence or individuality of any one.

PERSONALLY, pĕr'sŭn-ăl-lê. ad. In person, in presence, not by representative; with respect to an individual particularly; with regard to numerical existence.

To PERSONATE, pĕr'sŭn-âte. v. a. To represent by a fictitious or assumed character, so as to pass for the person represented; to represent by action or appearance, to act; to pretend hypocritically, with the reciprocal pronoun; to counterfeit, to feign; to resemble; to make a representative of as in a picture, out of use. See PERSONABLE.

PERSONATION, pĕr-sŭn-â'shŭn. s. Counterfeiting of another person.

PERSONIFICATION, pĕr-sŏn'nĕ-fĕ-kâ'shŭn. s. Prosopopœia, the change of things to persons,

To PERSONIFY, pĕr-sŏn'nĕ-fl. v. a. To change from a thing to a person.

PERSPECTIVE, pĕr-spĕk'tĭv. s. A glass through which things are viewed; the science by which things are ranged in a picture, according to their appearance in their real situation; view, visto.

☞ This word, as may be seen in Johnson, was generally accented by the poets on the first syllable; but the harshness of this pronunciation arising from the uncombinable consonants in the latter syllables, has prevented this pronunciation from gaining any ground in prose; and it were much to be wished that the same reason had prevented the initial accentuation of similar words.—See IRREFRAGABLE, CORRUPTIBLE, ACCEPTABLE, &c.

PERSPECTIVE, pĕr-spĕk'tĭv. a. Relating to the science of vision, optick, optical.

PERSPICACIOUS, pĕr-spĕ-kâ'shŭs. a. Quick sighted, sharp of sight. Mentally applied.

PERSPICACIOUSNESS, pĕr-spĕ-kâ'shŭs-nĕs. s. Quickness of sight.

PERSPICACITY, pĕr-spĕ-kăs'sĕ-tê. s. Quickness of sight, of mental sight.

PERSPICIENCE, pĕr-spĭsh'ĕ-ĕnse. The act of looking sharply. Little used.

PERSPICIL, pĕr'spĕ-sĭl. s. A glass through which things are viewed, an optick glass.

PERSPICUITY, pĕr-spĕ-kŭ'ĕ-tê. s. Clearness to the mind, easiness to be understood, freedom from obscurity or ambiguity; transparency.

PERSPICUOUS, pĕr-spĭk'kŭ-ŭs. a. Transparent, clear, such as may be seen through; clear to the understanding, not obscure, not ambiguous.

PERSPICUOUSLY, pĕr-spĭk'kŭ-ŭs-lê. ad. Clearly, not obscurely.

PERSPICUOUSNESS, pĕr-spĭk'kŭ-ŭs-nĕs. Clearness without obscurity.

PERSPIRABLE, pĕr-spĭ'râ-bl. a. Such as may be emitted by the cuticular pores; perspiring, emitting perspiration.

PERSPIRATION, pĕr-spĕ-râ'shŭn. s. Excretion by the cuticular pores.

PERSPIRATIVE, pĕr-spĭ'râ-tĭv. a. (512). Performing the act of perspiration.

PETAL, pĕ'tăl, or pē'tăl. s. Petal is a term in Botany, signifying those fine-coloured leaves that compose the flowers of all plants. The leaf of a flower, as distinguished from the leaf of a plant.

☞ I must retract my former pronunciation of the first syllable of this word with Mr. Sheridan and Mr. Perry, and join Dr. Kenrick and Mr. Scott, who make the e long. In all words of this form we ought to incline to this pronunciation, from its being so agreeable to analogy. Let it not be pretended that the e in the Latin petalum is short; so is the a in labellum, and the i in libellus, which yet in the English label and libel we pronounce long. But however right the long sound of e may be by analogy, I am apprehensive that, as in Pedals, the short sound is in more general use.—See PEDALS.

PETALOUS, pĕt'tă-lŭs. a. (503). Having Petals.

PHALANX, fā'lănks, or făl'lănks. s. A troop of men closely embodied.

☞ The second manner of pronouncing this word is more general; but the first is more analogical. If, when we pronounce a Latin or Greek word of two syllables, having a single consonant between two vowels, we always make the first vowel long; it is very natural, when such a word is transplanted whole into our own language, to pronounce it in the same manner. That the quantity of the original has very little to do in this case, may be seen under the word DRAMA (544); and yet nothing but an absurd regard to this could have influenced the generality of speakers to pronounce this word with the first vowel short, contrary to the old genuine analogy of our own language, as Dr. Wallis calls it, and contrary to the manner in which we pronounce the word in the original; for though local, favour, and labour, have the first vowel short in the Latin localis, favor, and labor, we pronounce them both in Latin and English according to our own analogy, with the o and a long and open. The same may be observed of words from the Greek. In the word in question, therefore, the authority of Mr. Sheridan, Mr. Scott, and Dr. Ash, who make the first vowel long, ought to outweigh that of Dr. Kenrick, Mr. Perry, Entick, and Buchanan, who make it short.

terms of it from the Greek, but by pronouncing these terms contrary to the analogy of our own language. For this reason our pronunciation becomes full of anomalies, and the professors of an art speak one language, and the rest of the world another. Those, therefore, who are not chymists, ought, in my opinion, to enter their protest against the irregular sound of the g in this and similar words. Pronouncing the g soft, would only hurt the pride of the professor; but pronouncing it hard, would hurt the genius of the language.—See HETEROGENEOUS.

PHOSPHOR, fŏs'fŭr. (166.) } s. The PHOSPHORUS, fŏs'fō-rŭs. } morning star; a chymical substance which exposed to the air takes fire.

PHRASE, frāze. s. An idiom, a mode of speech peculiar to a language; an expression, a mode of speech.

To PHRASE, frāze. v. a. To style, to call, to term.

PHRASEOLOGY, frā-zē-ŏl'lō-jē. s. (518). Style, diction; a phrase book.

PHRENETICK, frē-nĕt'ĭk. a. Mad, inflamed in the brain, frantick.

☞ This word, as well as Frenitis, is pronounced by Mr. Sheridan with the accent on the first syllable; in which, though he is contrary to analogy, he is consistent. But Dr. Johnson, Dr. Kenrick, and Mr. Barclay, pronounce Frenetick with the accent on the first syllable, and Phrenitis with the accent on the second. That the penultimate accent is the true pronunciation in both can scarcely be doubted, if we consult analogy (509); and that it is most in use, may appear from the additional suffrages of Dr. Ash, Mr. Nares, Mr. Scott, Mr. Perry, W. Johnston, Entick, Bailey, and Fenning.

PHRENITIS, frē-nī'tĭs. s. (503). Madness; inflammation of the brain.

PHRENSY, frĕn'zē. s. Madness, frantickness.

PHYSICAL, fĭz'ē-kăl. a. (413). Wasting.

PHTHISICK, tĭz'zĭk. s. (413). A consumption.

PHTHISIS, thī'sĭs. s. (544). A consumption.

PHYLACTERY, fē-lăk'tĕr-ē. s. A bandage on which was inscribed some memorable sentence.

PHYSICAL, fĭz'zē-kăl. a. Relating to nature or to natural philosophy, not moral; pertaining to the science of healing; medicinal, helpful to health: resembling physick.

PHYSICALLY, fĭz'zē-kăl-lē. ad. According to nature, by natural operation, not morally.

PHYSICIAN, fē-zĭsh'ăn. s. One who professes the art of healing.

PHYSICK, fĭz'zĭk. s. The science of healing; medicines, remedies; in common phrase, a purge.

To PHYSICK, fĭz'zĭk. v. a. To purge, to treat with physick, to cure.

PHYSICOTHEOLOGY, fĭz-zē-kō-thē-ŏl'lō-jē. s. Divinity enforced or illustrated by natural philosophy.

PHYSIOGNOMER, fĭzh-ē-ŏg'nō-mŭr, or fĭz-ē-ŏg'nō-mŭr. } s.
PHYSIOGNOMIST, fĭzh-ē-ŏg'nō-mĭst. (518). } One who judges of the temper or future fortune by the features of the face.

☞ For the propriety of pronouncing the s in these words like zh, we need only appeal to analogy. S before a diphthong beginning with i, and having the accent before it, either primary or secondary, always goes into zh, as may be seen, Principles, No. 451. The secondary accent on the first syllable of these words gives a feebleness to the second, which occasions the aspiration of s as much as in evasion, adhesion, &c. where the s is preceded by the primary accent. It must, however, be acknowledged, that this is far from being the most general pronunciation.—See ECCLESIASTICK.

PHYSIOGNOMY, fĭzh-ē-ŏg'nō-mē. s. The art of discovering the temper and foreknowing the fortune by the features of the face; the face, the cast of the look.

☞ There is a prevailing mispronunciation of this word, by leaving out the g, as if the word were French. If this arises from ignorance of the common rules of spelling, it may be observed, that g is always pronounced before n when it is not in the same syllable; as sig-nify, indig-nity, &c; but if affectation be the cause of this errour, Dr. Young's Love of Fame will be the best cure for it.—See PATHOGNOMONICK.

PHYSIOLOGICAL, fĭzh-ē-ō-lŏd'jē-kăl. a. Relating to the doctrine of the natural constitution of things.

PHYSIOLOGIST, fĭzh-ē-ŏl'lō-jĭst. s. A writer of natural philosophy.

To PILL, pĭl. v. a. For Peel, to strip off the bark.

To PILL, pĭl. v. n. To come off in flakes or scoriæ.

☞ This word, says Dr. Johnson, should be written peel. To strip off the bark or rind of any thing is universally so pronounced; but when it is written pill, it is impossible to pronounce it peel, as Mr. Sheridan has done, without making the eye contradict the ear too palpably. I am of opinion that the pronunciation ought to conform to the orthography.——See BOWL.

PITH, pĭth. s. (467). The marrow of the plant, the soft part in the midst of the wood; marrow; strength, force; energy, cogency, fulness of sentiment, closeness and vigour of thought and style; weight, moment, principal part; the quintescence, the chief part.

PITHILY, pĭth'ĕ-lē. ad. With strength, with cogency.

PITHINESS, pĭth'ē-nĕs. s. Energy, strength.

PITHLESS, pĭth'lĕs. a. Wanting pith; wanting energy, wanting force.

PITHY, pĭth'ē. a. Consisting of pith; strong, forcible, energetick.

PITIABLE, pĭt'tē-â-bl. a. (405). Deserving pity.

☞ The diphthong ia, in this word, does not draw the preceding t to tsh as in piteous, and the reason seems to be the same as that which preserves the same letter pure in Mightier, Weightier, &c. that is, the termination able, though derived from the Latin, is often used in composition with pure English words, like the personal and comparative terminations er, eth, &c.; and therefore the general rule in English composition is adhered to, which is, that simples preserve their sound and accent, whatever terminations are annexed to them.

PITIFUL, pĭt'tē-fŭl. a. Melancholy, moving compassion; tender, compassionate; paltry, contemptible, despicable.

PITIFULLY, pĭt'tē-fŭl-ē. ad. Mournfully, in a manner that moves compassion; contemptibly, despicably.

PITILESS, pĭt'tē-lĕs. a. Wanting pity, wanting compassion, merciless.

PITTANCE, pĭt'tânse. s. An allowance of meat in a monastery; a small portion.

PITUITARY, pē-tū'ē-tâ-rē. a. Conducting the phlegm.—Mason.

PITUITE, pĭt'tshū-īte. s. (155). Phlegm.

PITUITOUS, pē-tū'ē-tŭs. a. (152). Consisting of phlegm.

PITY, pĭt'tē. s. Compassion, sympathy, with misery, tenderness for pain or uneasiness; a ground of Pity, a subject of pity or of grief.

To PITY, pĭt'tē. v. a. To compassionate misery, to regard with tenderness on account of unhappiness.

To PITY, pĭt'tē. v. n. To be compassionate.

PIVOT, pĭv'vŭt. s. A pin on which any thing turns.

PIX, pĭks. s. A little chest or box in which the consecrated Host is kept.

PLACABLE, plâ'kâ-bl. a. (405). Willing or possible to be appeased.

☞ Mr. Sheridan, Mr. Nares, W. Johnston, and Buchanan, make the radical a in this word and its derivatives long, as I have done; but Dr. Kenrick and Mr. Perry make it short. Mr. Scott marks it both ways, but seems to give the short sound the preference by placing it first. This, from the shortening power of the antepenultimate accent, it must be confessed, is the most analogical (535); but this word and its companion, capable, seem immoveably fixed on the long sound of the antepenultimate, though the o in the same situation in docible and indocible evidently inclines to the short sound.—See INCAPABLE, and INDOCIL.

PLACABILITY, plâ-kâ-bĭl'ē-tē. } s.
PLACABLENESS, plâ'kâ-bl-nĕs. } Willingness to be appeased, possibility to be appeased.

PLACARD, plâk-ârd'. } s. An edict, a
PLACART, plâk-ârt'. } declaration, a manifesto.

☞ Bailey places the accent on the first syllable of placard, and Fenning on the first of both these words: all our other orthoepists place the accent as I have done.

PLACE, plâse. s. Particular portion of space; locality, local relation; local existence; space in general; a seat, residence, mansion; passage in writing; state of being, validity; rank, order of priority; office, publick character or employment; room, way; ground, room.

PLAGIARY, plā'jā-rē. s. A theft in literature, one who steals the thoughts or writings of another; the crime of literary theft.

☞ Mr. Elphinston and some respectable speakers pronounce this word with the first vowel short, as if written plăd-jary; But Mr. Sheridan, Mr. Scott, Mr. Perry, Mr. Buchanan, Dr. Kenrick, W. Johnston, and Entick, mark it with the a long, as if written playjary: and to know which is the true pronunciation, we need only recur to analogy, which tells us, that every vowel, except i, having the accent, and being followed by a diphthong, is long.—See Principles, No. 505, 507.

PLAGUE, plāg. s. (337). Pestilence, a disease eminently contagious and destructive; state of misery; any thing troublesome or vexatious.

To PLAGUE, plāg. v. a. To trouble, to teaze, to vex, to harass, to torment, to afflict.

PLAINTFUL, plānt'fŭl. a. Complaining, audibly sorrowful.

PLAINTIFF, plāne'tĭf. s. He that commences a suit in law against another, opposed to the defendant.

☞ This word was universally, till of late years, pronounced with the first syllable like plan, as appears by its being adopted by Mr. Scott, Mr. Elphinston, Mr. Perry, W. Johnston, and Dr. Kenrick; but a laudable desire of reforming the language has restored the diphthong to its true sound; and the first syllable of this word like plane, is now the current pronunciation of all our courts of justice. Mr. Sheridan and Entick agree in this pronunciation.

PLAINTIFF, plāne'tĭf. a. Complaining. A word not in use, being now written plaintive.

PLAINTIVE, plāne'tĭv. a. Complaining, lamenting, expressive of sorrow.

PLAINWORK, plāne'wŭrk. s. Needlework as distinguished from embroidery.

PLAIT, plāte. s. (202). A fold, a double.

To PLAIT, plāte. v. a. To fold, to double; to weave, to braid.

☞ There is a corrupt pronunciation of this word, as if written plete, which must be carefully avoided.

PLANOCONVEX, plā-nō-kŏn'vĕks. a. Flat on the one side, and convex on the other.

PLANT, plănt. s. Any thing produced from seed, any vegetable production; a sapling.

☞ There is a coarse pronunciation of this word, chiefly among the vulgar, which rhymes it with aunt. This pronunciation seems a remnant of that broad sound which was probably given to the a before two consonants in all words, but which has been gradually wearing away, and which is now, except in a few words, become a mark of vulgarity.——See Principles, No. 79.

To PLANT, plănt. v. a. To put into the ground in order to grow, to act, to generate; to place, to fix; to settle, to establish, as to Plant a colony; to fill or adorn with something planted, as he Planted the garden or the country; to direct properly, as to Plant a cannon.

☞ I have preferred those orthöepists who mark these words as I have done, to Mr. Sheridan, who makes the first syllable like the verb to ply. Dr. Kenrick, Mr. Scott and Perry, the only orthöepists from whom we can know the sound of the diphthong ei, give it as I have done; and Johnson, by placing the accent after the e, seems to have done the same: but the sound we invariably give to these vowels in Pleiades, is a sufficient proof of English analogy; and that pronouncing them like e, is an affectation of adhering to the Greek, from which Pleiades is derived.—See Key to the Classical Pronunciation of Greek and Latin Proper Names, under the word.

PLENARILY, plē'nă-rē-lē. ad. Fully, completely.

PLENARY, plē'nă-rē, or plĕ'nă-rē. Full, complete.

☞ Some very respectable speakers make the vowel e, in the first syllable of this word, long; but analogy and the best usage seem to shorten the e, as they do the a in Granary. Mr. Nares, W. Johnston, Buchanan, and Entick, adopt the second pronunciation; and Mr. Sheridan, Dr. Ash, Mr. Scott, and Mr. Perry, the first: nor do I see any reason why the e should not be short in this word as well as in plenitude, in which all our orthöepists, except Buchanan, pronounce the e as in plenty.

PLENARINESS, plē'nă-rē-nĕs. s. Fulness, completeness.

PLENILUNARY, plē-nē-lū'nă-rē. a. Relating to the full moon.

PLENTIFULLY, plĕn'tē-fŭl-ē. ad. Copiously, abundantly.

PLENTIFULNESS, plĕn'tē-fŭl-nĕs. s. The state of being plentiful, abundance, fertility.

PLENTY, plĕn'tē. s. Abundance, such a quantity as is more than enough; fruitfulness, exuberance; it is used, I think, barbarously for plentiful; a state in which enough is had and enjoyed.

PLEONASM, plē'ō-năzm. s. A figure of rhetorick, by which more words are used than are necessary.

PLETHORA, plĕth'ō-rā. s. (468). The state in which the vessels are fuller of humours than is agreeable to a natural state of health.

☞ All our orthöepists, except a Dictionary of Terms in Medicine, place the accent on the first syllable of this word, notwithstanding the Greek and Latin o are long. This probably arose from the anglicised word Plethory, where the accent is very properly antepenultimate.—See Principles, No. 503.

To PREDICATE, prĕd'dē-kāte. v. a. To affirm any thing of another thing.

PREDICATE, prĕd'dē-kăt. s. (91). That which is affirmed of the subject. Thus in the sentence, "Man is a rational animal," Man is the subject, and a rational animal is the predicate. In this sentence also, "The Wages of sin is Death." Death is the subject, and the Wages of sin is the predicate, where it may likewise be observed, that it is the subject of a proposition which governs the verb, and forms what is called the Nominative case.

PREDICATION, prĕd-ē-kā'shŭn. s. Affirmation concerning any thing.

To PREDICT, prē-dĭkt'. v. a. To foretell, to foreshow.

PREDICTION, prē-dĭk'shŭn. s. Prophesy, declaration of something future.

PREDIGESTION, prē-dē-jĕs'tshŭn. s. Digestion too soon performed.

PREDILECTION, prē-dē-lĕk'shŭn. s. Preference, partiality, prepossession in favour of any thing.

☞ It is probable that this word was not in use when Dr. Johnson wrote his Dictionary, or he would have inserted it; perhaps it was first used by the author of the Letters signed Junius; but the readiness with which it has since been adopted by the most respectable writers, is a sufficient proof of its propriety and utility. Scott, Entick, and Mason, are the only orthoepists who have inserted this word.

To PREDISPOSE, prē-dĭs-pōze'. v. a. To adapt previously to any certain purpose.

PREDISPOSITION, prē-dĭs-pō-zĭsh'ŭn. s. Previous adaptation to any certain purpose.

PREFECT, prē'fĕkt. s. A governor.

PREFECTURE, prĕf'fĕk-tūre. s. Command, office of government.

☞ Though I have agreed with all our orthoëpists in making the first syllable of prefect long, I cannot follow them so implicitly in the accent and quantity of this word. All but Mr. Sheridan, W. Johnston, and Mr. Perry, place the accent on the second syllable; and the two first of these writers make the first syllable long, as in prefect. Mr. Perry alone has, in my opinion, given this word its true pronunciation, by placing the accent on the first syllable, and making that syllable short. This is agreeable to that general tendency of our language to an antepenultimate accentuation, and a short quantity on every vowel but u. See Principles, No. 533, 535.

To PREFER, prē-fĕr'. v. a. To regard more than another; to advance, to exalt, to raise; to offer solemnly, to propose publickly, to exhibit.

To PRIM, prim. v. a. To deck up precisely, to form to an affected nicety.

PRIMACY, prī'mâ-sē. s. The chief ecclesiastical station.

☞ Mr. Elphinston is the only orthöepist who gives the short sound to i in this word. Perhaps no one understands the analogies of our language better; but in this and several other words he overturns the very foundation of language, which is general custom. I am well acquainted with the shortening power of the antepenultimate accent (535); and if custom were wavering, this ought to decide; but in this word, and primary, custom is uniform, and precludes all appeal to analogy.

macy; but my ear and observation greatly fail me, if the first mode of pronouncing this word is not the most agreeable to polite as well as general usage. It seems to retain the sound of its primitive private, as piracy does of pirate; which word piracy Mr. Elphinston, in opposition to all our orthoepists, pronounces with the i short.

PRIVADO, prĭ-vä'dō. s. A secret friend. Not used.—See LUMBAGO.

PRIVATE, prī'vât. a. (91). Secret; alone; being upon the same terms with the rest of the community, opposed to publick; particular, not relating to the publick; in private, secretly, not publickly.

PRIVATEER, prī-vâ-tēēr'. s. A ship fitted out by private men to plunder enemies.

PRIVATIVE, prĭv'vâ-tĭv. a. (133). Causing privation of any thing; consisting in the absence of something; not positive.

☞ Mr. Sheridan, Dr. Kenrick, Dr. Ash, Mr. Scott, W. Johnston, and Entick, make the first syllable of this word short, as I have done; and Mr. Perry and Buchanan make it long. In defence of the first pronunciation it may be observed, that this word is not like primacy and primary, the first of which is a formative of our own; and the second, derived from the Latin primarius, which in our pronunciation of the Latin, does not shorten the i in the first syllable as privativus does, (see ACADEMY and INCOMPARABLE;) and therefore these words are no rule for the pronunciation of this; which, besides the general tendency of the penultimate accent to shorten every vowel it falls on but u (535), seems to have another claim to the short vowel from its termination: thus sănative, dŏnative, primative, derivative, &c. all plead for the short sound.

PRIVATIVE, prĭv'vâ-tĭv. s. (157). That of which the essence is the absence of something, as silence is only the absence of sound.

PRIVATIVELY, prĭv'vâ-tĭv-lé. ad. By the absence of something necessary to be present, negatively.

PRIVATIVENESS, prĭv'vâ-tĭv-nĕs. s. Notation of absence of something that should be present.

☞ Mr. Sheridan, Mr. Nares, Dr. Johnson, Dr. Ash, Mr. Scott, W. Johnston, and Mr. Perry, place the accent on the first syllable of this word; and those who give the quantity of the vowels make it short: Buchanan alone, though he places the accent on the first syllable, makes it long.

Mr. Nares suspects the accentuation of this word on the second syllable to be the most ancient, though Shakespeare so frequently places the accent on the first:

"Tell her the process of Antonio's end."
Merchant of Venice.

"In brief, to set the needless process by."
Measure for Measure.

"In process of the seasons I have seen."
Shakespeare's Sonnets.

But Milton accents the second syllable:

"Cannot without process of speech be told."
Par. Lost, viii. 178.

"——— which might rise
"By policy and long process of time."
Ibid. ii. 297.

There is a phrase, as Mr. Nares observes, in process of time, when we oftener hear the accent on the second syllable of this word than the first. This is undoubtedly a proof of the justness of his observation respecting the antiquity of this pronunciation; but as it is now antiquated in other phrases, it ought not to be used in this.

PROCESSION, prō-sĕsh'ŭn. s. A train marching in ceremonious solemnity.

PROCESSIONAL, prō-sĕsh'ŭn-ăl. a. Relating to procession.

PROLOCUTOR, prōl-lō-kū'tŭr. s. (503). The foreman, the speaker of a convocation.

☞ In compliance with so many authorities I placed the accent on the antepenultimate syllable of Interlocutor, and nearly the same authorities oblige me to place the accent on the penultimate of this word; for so Dr. Johnson, Dr. Kenrick, Dr. Ash, W. Johnston, Mr. Perry, Buchanan, Barclay, Fenning, and Bailey, accent it. But surely these two words ought not to be differently accented; and if my opinion had any weight, I would accent them both on the penultimate, as they may be considered exactly like words ending in ator, and ought to be accented in the same manner. Mr. Sheridan and Mr. Scott are very singular in placing the accent on the first syllable.—See INTERLOCUTOR.

PRONOUN, prō'nŏun. s. (313). Words used instead of nouns or names.

To PRONOUNCE, prō-nŏunse'. v. a. (313). To speak, to utter confidently; to form or articulate by the organs of speech; to utter rhetorically.

To PRONOUNCE, prō-nŏunse'. v. n. To speak with confidence or authority.

PRONOUNCER, prō-nŏun'sŭr. s. (98). One who pronounces.

PRONUNCIATION, prō-nŭn-shė-ā'shŭn. s. Act or mode of utterance.

☞ There are few words more frequently mispronounced than this. A mere English scholar, who considers the verb to pronounce as the root of it, cannot easily conceive why the e is thrown out of the second syllable; and therefore, to correct the mistake, sounds the word as if written Pronounciation. Those who are sufficiently learned to escape this errour, by understanding that the word comes to us either from the Latin pronunciatio, or the French pronunciation, are very apt to fall into another, by sinking the first aspiration, and pronouncing the third syllable like the noun sea. But these speakers ought to take notice, that, throughout the whole language, c, s, and t, preceded by the accent, either primary or secondary, and followed by ea, ia, io, or any similar diphthong, always become aspirated, and are pronounced as if written she. Thus the very same reasons that oblige us to pronounce partiality, propitiation, especially, &c. as if written parsheality, propisheation, espesheally, &c. oblige us to pronounce pronunciation as if written pronunsheashun. See Principles, No. 357, 459, 461, and the word ECCLESIASTICK.

But though Mr. Sheridan avoids the vulgar errour of sinking the aspiration, in my opinion he falls into one fully as exceptionable; which is, that of pronouncing the word in four syllables, as if written Pro-nun-shea-shun. I am grossly mistaken if correct speakers do not always pronounce this and similar words in the manner I have marked them: and, indeed, Mr. Sheridan himself seems dubious with respect to some of them; for though he pronounces glaciate, glaciation, association, &c. glashate, glasha-shun, as-so-sha-shun, &c. yet he spells conglaciate, conglaciation, and association, —con-gla-syate, con-gla-sya-shun, con-so-sya-shun. See Principles, No. 542, 543.

☞ The first pronunciation of this word is adopted by Mr. Sheridan, Mr. Scott, Dr. Kenrick, Mr. Smith, Mr. Perry, Buchanan, Barclay, Bailey, and Fenning; and the second by Mr. Nares, Dr. Ash, Dr. Johnson, and Entick. As this substantive was derived from the verb, it had formerly the accent of the verb: and that this accent was the most prevailing, appears from the majority of authorities in its favour. But the respectable authorities for the second pronunciation, and the pretence of distinguishing it from the verb, may very probably establish it, to the detriment of the sound of the language, without any advantage to its signification. See BOWL.

☞ Mr. Elphinston, Dr. Kenrick, Mr. Smith, Mr. Perry, and Buchanan, are for the first pronunciation of this word; and Mr. Sheridan, Mr. Nares, Mr. Scott, W. Johnston, and Barclay, for the second. When authorities are so balanced, analogy ought to decide; and that is clearly for the first pronunciation. See Principles, No. 323.

PROWESS, prou'ĕs, or prō'is. s. Bravery, valour, military gallantry.

☞ Mr. Sheridan, Mr. Scott, Dr. Kenrick, W. Johnston, and Perry, adopt the first sound of this word; and Mr. Nares only the second; here too analogy must decide for the first. See Principles, No. 323.

To PROWL, proul, or prole. v. a. To wander for prey, to prey, to plunder.

☞ This word, among many others composed of the diphthong ow, is subject to a double pronunciation; the one rhyming with cowl, and the other with stroll. That the former is more agreeable to analogy may be seen from the more numerous instances of this sound of the ow than of the other; that the latter pronunciation, however, was very prevalent, may be gathered from the mode of spelling this word in Philips's Pastorals. edit. 1748.—Tonson and Draper.

"I, only with the proling wolf, constrain'd
"All night to wake; with hunger he is
"pain'd,
"And I with love. His hunger he may "tame;
"But who can quench, O cruel Love! thy "flame?"

The authorities for the first pronunciation are Mr. Sheridan, Mr. Smith, Mr. Scott, Buchanan, and W. Johnston; and for the second, Dr. Kenrick, Mr. Nares, and Mr. Perry: and analogy must decide as in the two foregoing words. See Principles, No. 325.

PULMONARY, pŭl'mō-nār-ē. a. (177). Belonging to the lungs.

PULMONICK, pŭl-mŏn'nĭk. a. (509). Belonging to the lungs.

PULP, pŭlp. s. Any soft mass; the soft part of fruit.

☞ All our orthoepists, except Mr. Elphinston, give the u in this word the same sound as in dull, and not as in pull as he has done.

PULPIT, pŭl'pĭt. s. (174). A place raised on high, where a speaker stands; the higher desk in the church, where the sermon is pronounced.

☞ Mr. Sheridan, Mr. Scott, Mr. Nares, Dr. Kenrick, and W. Johnston, pronounce the u in this word as I have done. Mr. Perry alone gives it the sound of u in dull.

PULPOUS, pŭlp'ŭs. a. Soft.

PULPOUSNESS, pŭlp'ŭs-nĕs. s. The quality of being pulpous.

PULPY, pŭlp'ē. a. Soft, pappy.

PULVIL, pŭl'vĭl. s. Sweet scents.

To PULVIL, pŭl'vĭl. v. a. To sprinkle with perfumes in powder.

PUMICE, pū'mĭs, or pŭm'mĭs. s. A slag or cinder of some fossil.

☞ This word ought to be pronounced pewmis. In nothing is our language more regular than in preserving the u open when the accent is on it, and followed by a single consonant; and therefore Mr. Sheridan, Mr. Scott, and Buchanan, who give it this sound, ought rather to be followed than Mr. Elphinston, Dr. Kenrick, W. Johnston, Perry, and Entick, who adopt the short u.—See LUCULENT.

PUMMEL, pŭm'mĭl. s. (99). See POMMEL.

PUMP, pŭmp. s. An engine by which water is drawn up from wells, its operation is performed by the pressure of the air; a shoe with a thin sole and low heel.

☞ The common pronunciation of London is the first sound given to this word; but in Ireland and the different counties of England, it is generally pronounced regularly so as to rhyme with but, nut, &c. W. Johnston has adopted this sound, and Mr. Perry gives it both ways, but seems to prefer the regular sound. Mr. Nares is decidedly in favour of this sound; and as this word, when a noun, is always so pronounced, it seems a needless departure from rule, and embarrassing the language, to have the same word differently pronounced. This is an inconvenience to which perhaps all languages are subject; but it ought in all languages to be avoided as much as possible.—See BOWL.

Mr. Sheridan, Mr. Elphinston, Mr. Scott, Dr. Kenrick, and Mr. Smith, adopt the first sound.

PYGARG, pī'gārg. s. A bird.

PYGMEAN, pĭg-mē'ăn. a. Belonging to a pygmy.

☞ This word has the accent on the penultimate for the same reason as Epicurean. It is derived from Pygmæi, Pygmies; and its adjective, if it had one, must have had the diphthong in it, which would necessarily fix the accent on that syllable.—See EUROPEAN.

"They less than smallest dwarfs in narrow room
"Throng numberless like that pygmean race
"Beyond the Indian mount."——Milton.

PYGMY, pĭg'mē. s. A dwarf, one of a nation fabled to be only three spans high, and after long wars to have been destroyed by cranes.

PYRE, pīre. s. A pile to be burnt.

PYRITES, pē-rī'tēz, or pĭr'ē-tēz. s. (187). Firestone.

☞ This word is accented on the second syllable by Dr. Johnson, Mr. Sheridan, Barclay, Bailey, and Fenning; and on the first by Dr. Kenrick, Dr. Ash, Mr. Perry, and Entick. Pyrites is the analogical pronunciation; for as the word is derived from the Greek πυρίτης and the Latin Pyrites, (both with the accent on the penultimate, and preserving the form of their originals,) it ought to have the accent on the same syllables. See Principles, No. 503.

QUADRANT, kwâ'drânt. s. (85). The fourth part, the quarter; the quarter of a circle; an instrument with which latitudes are taken.

☞ It has been observed in the Principles, No, 85, 86, &c. that a, by articulating the a, gives it the deep broad sound equivalent to the diphthong au; and that u, preceded by q, has exactly the same effect (414).—This is evident from the sound of a in this and similar words, which, till lately, was always pronounced broad. Some innovators have attempted to give the a in this word its slender sound; but the publick ear seems in opposition to it, nor ought it to be admitted. The broad sound is the genuine English pronunciation, as appears in every word where it is succeeded by r As this consonant, when final, or followed by another consonant, gives every a that precedes it the Italian sound heard in father; so, when these letters are preceded by qu, or w, the a falls into the broad sound heard in water. Thus, as we hear bar, dart, barrel, with the sound of the Italian a; so we hear war, quart, and quarrel, with the German a. Equator, quaver, and words ending with hard c, g, and f, have departed from this rule; but a sufficient number of words are left to indicate plainly what is the analogy, and to direct us where usage is doubtful.

QUOIT, kwŏit. s. Properly Coit. (415). Something thrown to a great distance to a certain point; the discus of the ancients is sometimes called in English Quoit, but improperly.

☞ Till the orthography of a word is fixed, it will not be easy to settle its pronunciation. That the words Quoif and Quoit ought to be written Coif and Coit, appears from the derivation of the first from the French coeffe, and of the second from the Dutch coete; and if this be granted, it will necessarily follow that we ought to pronounce them Coif and Coit (415).

To QUOIT, kwŏit. v. n. To throw quoits, to play at quoits.

To QUOIT, kwŏit. v. a. To throw.

QUONDAM, kwŏn'dăm. a. Having been formerly. A ludicrous word.

QUOTATION, kwō-tā'shŭn. s. (415). The act of quoting, citation; passage adduced out of an author as evidence or illustration.

☞ In this and similar words Mr. Sheridan, and several respectable orthöepists, pronounce the qu like k; but, as Mr. Nares justly observes, it is not easy to say why. If it be answered, that the Latins so pronounced these letters, it may be replied, that when we alter our Latin pronunciation, it will be time enough to alter those English words which are derived from that language.

To QUOTE, kwōte. v. a. To cite an author, or the words of another.

QUOTER, kwō'tŭr. s. (98). Citer, he that quotes.

QUOTH, kwŭth, or kwōth. verb imp. Quoth I, say I, or said I; Quoth he, says he, or said he.

☞ Mr. Sheridan, Dr. Kenrick, Mr. Scott, W. Johnston, Mr Nares, Mr. Perry, and Mr. Smith, pronounce the o in this word long as in both; but Buchanan short, as in moth. This latter pronunciation is certainly more agreeable to the general sound of o before th, as in broth, froth, cloth, &c.; but my ear fails me if I have not always heard it pronounced like the o in doth, as if written kwuth, which is the pronunciation Mr. Elphinston gives it, and, in my opinion, is the true one.

QUOTIDIAN, kwō-tĭd'jē-ăn. a. Daily, happening every day.

QUOTIDIAN, kwō-tĭd'jē-ăn. s. (224) (293). A quotidian fever, a fever which returns every day.

RADICALLY, rád'dé-kál-é. ad. Originally, primitively.

RADICALNESS, rád'dé-kál-nés. s. The state of being radical.

To RADICATE, rád'dé-kâte. v. a. (91). To root, to plant deeply and firmly.

RADICATION, rád-dé-ká'shŭn. s. The act of fixing deep.

RADICLE, rád'dé-kl. s. (405). That part of the seed of a plant which becomes its root.

RADISH, rád'dish. s. A root which is commonly cultivated in the kitchen gardens.

☞ This word is commonly, but corruptly, pronounced as if written Reddish. The deviation is but small; nor do I think it so incorrigible as that of its brother esculents, ASPARAGUS, CUCUMBER, and LETTUCE; which see.

RADIUS, rà'dé-ŭs, or rà'jé-ŭs. s. (293) (294). The semi-diameter of a circle; a bone of the fore-arm, which accompanies the ulna from the elbow to the wrist.

To RAFFLE, ráf'fl. v. n. (405). To cast dice for a prize.

RAFFLE, ráf'fl. s. A species of game or lottery, in which many stake a small part of the value of some single thing, in consideration of a chance to gain it.

RAFT, ráft. s. (79). A frame or float made by laying pieces of timber cross each other.

RAFTER, ráf'tûr. s. (98). The secondary timbers of the house, the timbers which are let into the great beam.

RAFTERED, ráf'tûr'd. a. (359). Built with rafters.

RAG, rág. s. (74). A piece of cloth torn from the rest, a tatter; any thing rent and tattered, worn-out clothes.

RAGAMUFFIN, rág-à-mŭf'fin. s. A paltry mean fellow.

RAGE, rádje. s. Violent anger, vehement fury; vehemence or exacerbation of any thing painful.

To RAGE, rádje. v. n. (74). To be in fury, to be heated with excessive anger; to ravage, to exercise fury; to act with mischievous impetuosity.

RAGEFUL, rádje'fŭl. a. Furious, violent.

RAGGED, rág'gid. a. (99) (381). Rent into tatters; uneven, consisting of parts almost disunited; dressed in tatters; rugged, not smooth.

RAGGEDNESS, rág'gid-nés. s. State of being dressed in tatters.

RAGINGLY, rà'jing-lé. ad. With vehement fury.

RAGMAN, rág'mán. s. (88). One who deals in rags.

RAGOUT, rà-gôô'. s. French. Meat stewed and highly seasoned.

RAGSTONE, rág'stône. s. A stone so termed from its breaking in a rugged manner; the stone with which they smooth the edge of a tool new ground and left ragged.

RAGWORT, rág'wûrt. s. (166). A plant.

RAIL, râle. s. (202). A cross beam fixed in the ends of two upright posts; a series of posts connected with beams by which any thing is enclosed; a kind of bird; a woman's upper garment.

To RAIL, râle. v. a. To enclose with rails; to range in a line.

To RAIL, rāle. v. n. To use insolent and reproachful language.

RAILER, rāle'ŭr. s. (98). One who insults or defames by using opprobrious language.

RAILING, rā'lĭng. s. A series of rails; reproachful language.

RAILLERY, rāl'lĕr-ē. s. Slight satire, satirical merriment.

☞ We must not suppose this word to be the offspring of the English word to rail, however nearly they may be sometimes allied in practice. Raillery comes directly from the French word raillerie; and, in compliment to that language for the assistance it so often affords us, we pronounce the first syllable nearly as in the original. This, however, is not a mere compliment, like the generality of those we pay the French; for, were we to pronounce the first syllable like rail, it might obscure and pervert the meaning. Mr. Sheridan, Mr. Scott, Dr. Kenrick, Mr. Nares, W. Johnston, Mr. Perry, and Mr. Smith, pronounce it as I have marked it.

RAIMENT, rā'mĕnt. s. (202). Vesture, vestment, clothes, dress, garment.

To RAIN, rāne. v. n. (202). To fall in drops from the clouds; to fall as rain; It rains, the water falls from the clouds.

To RAIN, rāne. v. a. To pour down as rain.

RAIN, rāne. s. The moisture that falls from the clouds.

RAINBOW, rāne'bō. s. (327). The iris, the semi-circle of various colours which appears in showery weather.

RAINDEER, rāne'dēēr. s. A deer with large horns, which, in the northern regions, draws sledges through the snows.

RAININESS, rāne'ē-nĕs. s. The state of being showery.

RAINY, rāne'ē. a. Showery, wet.

To RAISE, rāze. v. a. (202). To lift, to heave; to set upright; to erect, to build up; to exalt to a state more great or illustrious; to increase in current value; to elevate; to advance, to prefer; to excite, to put in action; to excite to war or tumult, to stir up; to rouse, to stir up; To give beginning to, as he raised the family; to bring into being; to call into view from the state of separate spirits; to bring from death to life; to occasion, to begin; to set up, to utter loudly; to collect, to obtain a certain sum; to collect, to assemble, to levy; to give rise to; To raise paste, to form paste into pies without a dish.

RAISER, rāze'ŭr. s. (98). He that raises.

RAISIN, rē'z'n. s. A dried grape.

☞ If antiquity can give a sanction to the pronunciation of a word, this may be traced as far back as the days of Queen Elizabeth. Falstaff, in the first part of Henry the Fourth, being urged by the Prince, to give reasons for his conduct, tells him, that if raisins were as plenty as blackberries, he would not give him one upon compulsion. This pun evidently shews these words were pronounced exactly alike in Shakespeare's time, and that Mr. Sheridan's pronunciation of this word, as if written ray-s'n, is not only contrary to general usage, but, what many would think a greater offence, destructive of the wit of Shakespeare. Mr. Sheridan has Mr. Scott, Mr. Perry, and W. Johnston, on his side; and I have Dr. Kenrick and Mr. Nares on mine.

RAKE, rāke. s. An instrument with teeth, by which the ground is divided; a loose, disorderly, vicious, wild, gay, thoughtless fellow.

To RAKE, rāke. v. a. To gather with a rake; to draw together by violence; to scour, to search with eager and vehement diligence; to heap together and cover; to fire on a ship in the direction of head and stern.

To RAKE, rāke. v. n. To search, to grope; to pass with violence; to lead an irregular life.

RAKER, rāke'ŭr. s. One that rakes.

RAKEHELL, rāke'hĕl. s. A wild, worthless, dissolute, debauched fellow.

RAKEHELLY, rāke'hĕl-lē. a. Wild, dissolute.

RAKISH, rāke'ĭsh. a. Loose, dissolute.

To RALLY, răl'lē. v. a. To put disordered or dispersed forces into order; to treat with satirical merriment.

To RALLY, răl'lē. v. n. To come again into order; to exercise satirical merriment.

RAM, răm. s. A male sheep; an instrument to batter walls.

To RAM, răm. v. a. To drive with violence, as with a battering ram; to fill with any thing driven hard together.

RANDOM, răn'dŭm. s. (166). Want of direction, want of rule or method; chance, hazard, roving motion.

RANDOM, răn'dŭm. a. Done by chance, roving without direction.

RANG, răng. Preterit of Ring.

To RANGE, rānje. v. a. (74). To place in order, to put in ranks; to rove over.

To RANGE, rānje. v. n. To rove at large; to be placed in order.

RANGE, rānje. s. A rank, any thing placed in a line; a class, an order; excursion, wandering; room for excursion; compass taken in by any thing excursive.

RANGER, rān'jŭr. s. (98). One that ranges, a rover; a dog that beats the ground; an officer who tends the game of a forest.

RANK, răngk. a. (408). High growing, strong, luxuriant; fruitful, bearing strong plants; strong scented, rancid; high tasted, strong in quality, rampant, high grown; gross, coarse.

RANK, răngk. s. Line of men placed a-breast; a row; range of subordination; class, order; degree of dignity; dignity, high place, as He is a man of rank.

To RANK, răngk. v. a. To place a-breast; to range in any particular class; to arrange methodically.

To RANK, răngk. v. n. To be ranged, to be placed.

To RANKLE, răngk'kl. v. n. To fester, to breed corruption, to be inflamed in body or mind.

RANKLY, răngk'lĕ. ad. Coarsely, grossly.

RANKNESS, răngk'nĕs. s. Exuberance, superfluity of growth.

RANNY, răn'nĕ. s. The shrewmouse.

To RANSACK, răn'săk. v. n. To plunder, to pillage; to search narrowly.

RANSOME, răn'sŭm. s. (166). Price paid for redemption from captivity or punishment.

☞ I cannot conceive Dr. Johnson's reason for writing this word with the final e, since it comes from the French rancon, and all his examples are without this letter.

To RANSOM, răn'sŭm. v. a. To redeem from captivity or punishment.

RANSOMLESS, răn'sŭm-lĕs. a. Free from ransom.

To RANT, rănt. v. a. To rave in violent or high-sounding language.

RANT, rănt. s. High-sounding language.

RAPPER, răp'pŭr. s. (98). One who strikes.

RAPPORT, răp-pōrt'. s. French. Relation, reference.

RAPSODY, răp'sō-dē. s.

☞ A Rhapsody was originally the title of Homer's Poems, and meant no more than a collection of several smaller parts into one; but is now applied to any wild or unconnected effusions of imagination. As the R in the Greek Ῥαψῳδία has the rough breathing, this word is better written Rhapsody.

RAPTURE, răp'tshŭre. s. (461). Ecstasy, transport, violence of any pleasing passion; rapidity, haste.

RAPTURED, răp'tshŭr'd. a. (359). Ravished, transported

RAPTUROUS, răp'tshŭr-ŭs. a. (314). Ecstatick, transporting.

RARE, râre. a. Searce, uncommon; excellent, valuable to a degree seldom found; thinly scattered, thin, subtle, not dense; raw, not fully subdued by the fire. See REAR.

RARESHOW, râ'rē-shō. s. A show carried in a box.

RARELY, râre'lē. ad. Seldom, not often; finely, nicely, accurately.

RARENESS, râre'nĕs. s. Uncommonness, value arising from scarcity.

RARITY, râ'rē-tē. s. Uncommonness, infrequency; a thing valued for its scarcity.

RARITY, râr'ē-tē. (550). Thinness, subtlety, the contrary to density.

☞ The difference in the pronunciation of these words is not only necessary to convey their different signification, but to show their different etymology. The first comes to us from the French rareté, and the last from the Latin raritas; which therefore, according to the most settled analogy of our language, ought to have the antepenultimate syllable short. See Principles, No. 511; also the word CHASTITY.

RASCAL, răs'kăl. s. (88). A mean fellow, a scoundrel.

RASCALLION, răs-kăl'yŭn. s. (113). One of the lowest people.

RASCALITY, răs-kăl'ē-tē. s. The low mean people.

RASCALLY, răs'kăl-ē. a. Mean, worthless.

To RASE, râze, or râce. v. a. See Raze. To skim, to strike on the surface; to overthrow, to destroy, to root up; to blot out by rasure, to erase.

☞ There seems to be no small difficulty in settling the orthography and pronunciation of this word. Dr. Johnson advises, when it signifies to strike slightly, to write it rase; and when it signifies to ruin, raze. Whatever may be the utility of this distinction to the eye, the ear seems to have made no such distinction in the sound of the s; as graze, which is evidently formed from this word, and seems to have been adopted for the purpose of signifying to strike slightly, has preserved the z; while erase, which means to destroy, to expunge, to take away entirely, is by all our orthoepists, except Dr. Kenrick, pronounced with the s pure. But rase, whether signifying to strike slightly, or to overthrow, has been so generally pronounced with the s like z, that most of our writers have adopted the latter character; and this sound, it may be observed, seems more agreeable to the analogy of verbs in this termination than that in erase (437) (467). But as nothing seems to be more fixed in the language than the sharp hissing sound of s in erase, so if analogy and usage were to compound the difference, perhaps it would be easier to bring rase to the sound of race, as Mr. Elphinston has done, than erase to the sound of eraze, as Dr. Kenrick has done: but to sound it with the hissing s when it is written raze, as Mr. Sheridan has done, is a solecism in pronunciation; for though s often goes into the sound of z, z never goes into that of s.

The confusion observable among our authors in this word sufficiently shows how inconvenient it is to make the same letters sound differently when a different sense is conveyed. Dr. Johnson seems aware of this when he recommends a different orthography for this word, as it acquires a different meaning; but he does not tell us whether rase is to be pronounced like race or raze; nor do any of our orthoepists make this distinction of sound according to the sense. With great deference to Dr. Johnson, perhaps such a distinction, both in sound and spelling, is unnecessary and embarrassing. The best way therefore, in my opinion, will be always to spell this word with the z as in razor, and to pronounce it with the z when it is written rase.—See BOWL.

RASH, răsh. a. Hasty, violent, precipitate.

RASH, răsh. s. An efflorescence on the body, a breaking out.

RATAN, răt-tăn'. s. An Indian cane.

RATE, rāte. s. Price fixed on any thing; allowance settled; degree, comparative height or value; quantity assignable; that which sets value; manner of doing any thing; degree to which any thing is done; tax imposed by the parish.

To RATE, rāte. v. a. To value at a certain price; to chide hastily and vehemently.

RATH, răth. a. Early, coming before the time.

RATHER, răTH'ŭr, or rā'THŭr. ad. More willingly, with better liking; preferably to the other, with better reason; in a greater degree than otherwise; more properly; especially; To have rather, to desire in preference, a bad expression; it should be, Will rather.

☞ Dr. Johnson tells us, that this word is the comparative of rath, a Saxon word, signifying soon, and that it still retains its original signification; as we may say, "I "would sooner do a thing," with as much propriety as "I would rather do it." Some very respectable speakers pronounce this word with the first syllable like that in Rā-ven; and Mr. Nares has adopted this pronunciation. Dr. Ash and Bailey seem to be of the same opinion; but all the other orthoepists, from whom we can certainly know the quantity of the vowel, as Mr. Sheridan, Mr. Elphinston, Mr. Scott, Dr. Kenrick, W. Johnston, Mr. Perry, Buchanan, and Entick, make it short. There is a pronunciation of this, and some few other words, which may not improperly be called diminutive. Thus in familiar conversation, when we wish to express very little, we sometimes lengthen the vowel, and pronounce the word as if written leetle. In the same manner, when rather signifies just preferable, we lengthen the first vowel, and pronounce it long and slender, as if written raythur; and this, perhaps, may be the reason why the long slender sound of the vowel has so much obtained, for usage seems to be clearly on the side of the other pronunciation, and analogy requires it, as this word is but the old comparative of the word rath, soon.

RATIFIA, rât-ė-fēė'. s. A liquor, flavoured with fruit-kernels.—Mason.

RATIFICATION, rât-tė-fė-kā'shŭn. s. The act of ratifying, confirmation.

RAVELIN, rāv'lĭn. s. In fortification, a work that consists of two faces, that make a salient angle commonly called half-moon by the soldiers.

RAVEN, rā'v'n. s. (103). A large black fowl.

To RAVEN, rāv'v'n. v. a. (103). To devour with great eagerness and rapacity.

After enumerating several derivations of this word, Skinner seems at last to have fixed on the true one, by deriving it from the word raven, as this bird is the most voracious and greedy of all others.

RAVENOUS, rāv'v'n-ŭs. a. Furiously voracious, hungry to rage.

RAVENOUSLY, rāv'v'n-ŭs-lė. ad. With raging voracity.

REAR, rēre. s. (227). The hinder troop of an army, or the hinder line of a fleet; the last class.

REAR, rēre. a. (227). Raw, half roasted, half sodden.

☞ This word is frequently, but corruptly, pronounced as if written rare. But though rear, rhyming with fear, is the true pronunciation, we must not suppose it to have the least affinity and signification with rear (behind). Junius and Skinner derive this word from the Saxon word hrere, signifying fluent or trembling like the white or yolk of an egg when unconcocted; hence Junius explains the phrase a Reer-egg, a trembling egg; and Skinner imagines that this word may come from the Greek word Ῥέω, to flow, because unconnected eggs flow or move about: or he supposes that our word rear, and the Saxon hrere, may possibly come from the Latin rarus, as opposed to dense, because eggs, when boiled, lose their fluidity, and grow thick. This derivation of Skinner seems a little too far fetched. Whatever may be its origin in the Saxon, it seems to have been used in that language for crude and unconcocted; from the Saxon it comes to us in that sense, and, in my opinion, ought to be written as well as pronounced Rere.

To REAR, rēre. v. a. To raise up; to lift up from a fall; to bring up to maturity; to educate, to instruct; to exalt, to elevate; to rouse, to stir up.

REARWARD, rēre'wărd. s. The last troop; the end, the tail, a train behind; the latter part.

RECEPTACLE, rĕs'sĕp-tă-kl, or rē-sĕp'tă-kl. s. A vessel or place into which any thing is received.

☞ The first of these pronunciations is by far the most fashionable, but the second most agreeable to analogy and the ear. So many mutes in the latter syllables require the aid of the antepenultimate accent to pronounce them with ease, and they ought always to have it. See ACCEPTABLE and CORRUPTIBLE.

The best way to show what is the general usage in the accentuation of this word, will be to give it as accented by different orthöepists.

Rec'eptacle, Mr. Sheridan, W. Johnston.

Receptacle, Drs. Johnson, Kenrick, Ash, Mr. Nares, Mr. Smith, Perry, Scott, Buchanan, Barclay, Fenning, Bailey, Dyche, and Entick.

RECEPTIBILITY, rē-sĕp-tē-bĭl'ē-tē. s. Possibility of receiving.

RECEPTIVE, rē-sĕp'tĭv. a. Having the quality of admitting what is communicated.

RECEPTORY, rĕs'sĕp-tŭr-ē. a. Generally or popularly admitted.

☞ Dr. Johnson and Mr. Sheridan place the accent on the first syllable of this word, and on the second of Deceptory; but as these words are both of the same form, till some reason can be given for accenting them differently, I shall consider them both as accented on the first syllable, as that accentuation appears to be not only most agreeable to polite usage, but to the general analogy of words of this termination. —See PEREMPTORY.

A view of the diversity of accentuation among our orthöepists will enable the inspector to judge of the propriety of that which I have adopted:

Rec'eptary, Mr. Sheridan, Dr. Johnson, folio and quarto, and Barclay.

Receptary, Dr. Ash, Mr. Scott, Scott's Bailey, Mr. Perry, Fenning, and Entick.

RECONCILEABLE, rĕk-kŏn-sī'lă-bl. a. Capable of renewed kindness; consistent, possible to be made consistent.

☞ Though Dr. Johnson and Mr. Sheridan have written Reconcileable, Unreconcileable, and Reconcileableness, with the mute e in the middle of these words, they have omitted it in Irreconcilable, Irreconcilably, and Irreconcilableness. This has sometimes occasioned an impropriety in the pronunciation of these words, by sounding the preceding i short, as in silver, and giving the words a syllable more than they ought to have, as if divided into Rec-on-si'-le-able, &c.; but as the orthography is wrong, so is the pronunciation. The mute e ought to have no place, when followed by a vowel, in words of our own composition, where the preceding vowel has its general sound; and therefore, as it is Inclinable, Desirable, &c. so it ought to be Reconcilable, Reconcilably, &c. This was the orthography adopted by Dyche before it became so fashionable to imitate the French. See MOVEABLE.

RECONCILEABLENESS, rĕk-kŏn-sī'lă-bl-nĕs. s. Consistence, possibility to be reconciled; disposition to renew love.

RECONCILEMENT, rĕk'kŏn-sīle-mĕnt. s. Reconciliation, renewal of kindness, favour restored, friendship renewed.

RECONCILER, rĕk'kŏn-sī-lŭr. s. One who renews friendship between others; one who discovers the consistence between propositions seemingly contradictory.

RECONCILIATION, rĕk-kŏn-sĭl-ē-ā'shŭn. s. Renewal of friendship.

To RECONDENSE, rē-kŏn-dĕnse'. v. a. To condense anew.

RECONDITE, rĕk'kŏn-dīte. a. Secret, profound, abstruse.

☞ Dr. Johnson, Dr. Ash, Dr. Kenrick, Mr. Barclay, Mr. Nares, Mr. Scott, Mr. Fry, and Entick, accent this word on the second syllable; Mr. Sheridan and Bailey on the last; and Fenning only on the first. But notwithstanding so many authorities are against me, I am much deceived if the analogy of pronunciation be not decidedly in favour of that accentuation which I have given. We have but few instances in the language where we receive a word from the Latin, by dropping a syllable, that we do not remove the accent higher than the original (503). Thus recondite, derived from reconditus, may with as much propriety remove the accent from the long penultimate, as carbuncle from carbunculus; calumny from calumnia, detriment from detrimentum, innocency from innocentia, controversy from controversia, and a thousand others. Besides, it may be observed, that Mr. Sheridan and Bailey, by accenting this word on the last syllable, do not decide against the accent on the first; for all words of three syllables which may be accented on the last, may also have an accent on the first, though not inversely (524). The antepenultimate accent, to which our language has such a tendency, ought, in my opinion, to be indulged in this word, notwithstanding the numerous authorities against it. The word Incondite must certainly follow the fortunes of the present word; and we find those orthoepists who have the word, accent it as they do recondite, Mr. Sheridan on the last syllable, but Mr. Fenning inconsistently on the second.

To RECORD, rē-kŏrd'. v. a. (492). To register any thing, so that its memory may not be lost; to celebrate, to cause to be remembered solemnly.

RECORD, rĕk'ŏrd, or rē-kŏrd'. s. Register, authentic memorial.

☞ The noun record was anciently, as well as at present, pronounced with the accent either on the first or second syllable: till lately, however, it generally conformed to the analogy of other words of this kind; and we seldom heard the accent on the second syllable, till a great luminary of the law, as remarkable for the justness of his elocution as his legal abilities, revived the claim this word anciently had to the ultimate accent; and since his time this pronunciation, especially in our courts of justice, seems to have been the most general. We ought, however, to recollect, that this is overturning one of the most settled analogies of our language in the pronunciation of dissyllable nouns and verbs of the same form. See Principles, No. 492.

"But many a crime, deem'd innocent on earth,
"Is register'd in heav'n; and there no doubt
"Have each their record with a curse an-

☞ I must in this word retract my former opinion, and give the preference to the accent on the second syllable. Mr. Sheridan and W. Johnston might, like myself, suppose usage on their side; but the authority of Drs. Johnson, Ash, Kenrick, Mr. Nares, Perry, Barclay, Fenning, Bailey, Dyche, and Entick, is sufficient to make us suspect that usage has not so clearly decided: and therefore, though some words of this form and number of syllables depart from the accentuation of the Latin words from which they are derived, as ignorant, laborant, adjutant, permanent, confident, &c.; yet the general rule seems to incline to the preservation of the accent of the original, when the same number of syllables are preserved in the English word—to say nothing of the more immediate formation of this word from the judicial verb To recuse. See Principles, Nos. 437 and 503, b and k.

☞ Almost all the Dictionaries I have consulted, except Mr. Sheridan's, place the accent on the second syllable of this word; and yet, so prevalent has the latter accentuation been of late years, that Mr. Nares is reduced to hope it is not fixed beyond recovery. There is, indeed, one reason why this word ought not to have the accent on the first syllable, and that is, the two mutes in the second and third, which are not so easily pronounced when the accent is removed from them, as the mutes and liquids in accessory, consistory, desultory, &c.; and therefore I am decidedly in favour of the accentuation on the second syllable, which is adopted by Dr. Johnson, Dr. Ash, Dr. Kenrick, W. Johnston, Mr. Nares, Buchanan, Perry, Scott, Bailey, Barclay, and Entick, as all words of this termination have the accent on the same syllable.—See REFRACTORY, PEREMTORY, CORRUPTIBLE, and IRREFRAGABLE.

☞ All our orthöepists, except Bailey and Dyche, place the accent on the second syllable of this word; and we need but attend to the difficulty and indistinctness which arises from placing the accent on the first syllable, to condemn it. The mutes c hard and t are formed by parts of the organs so distinct from each other, that, without the help of the accent to strengthen the organs, they are not very readily pronounced—to say nothing of the difficulty of pronouncing the substantive refractoriness and the adverb refractorily with the accent on the first syllable, which must necessarily be the case if we accent the first syllable of this word.—See CORRUPTIBLE.

REFRAGABLE, rĕf'frà-gà-bl. a. Capable of confutation and conviction.

☞ In this word there is not the same concurrence of consonants as in the last, and consequently not the same reason for placing the accent on the second syllable. See IRREFRAGABLE.

sive; and that it has only been transferred from the Scotch Bar to the British Parliament. But that this is not the sense of the French relevant, or the Latin relevo, is certain; and that relevant in this sense seems nearly the same as relative or related. To say nothing of the impropriety of introducing technical words in a general assembly of the nation, it may be observed, that using the word in this sense, which is that which it generally has in our parliamentary debates, tends to overturn the most settled meaning of words, and, instead of precision and accuracy, to create obscurity and confusion. .)

RELEVATION, rĕl-ĕ-vā'shŭn. s. A raising or lifting up.

RELIANCE, rē-lī'ânse. s. Trust, dependence, confidence.

RELICK, rĕl'ĭk. s. That which remains, that which is left after the loss or decay of the rest; it is generally used in the plural; it is often taken for the body deserted by the soul; that which is kept in memory of another with a kind of religious veneration.

REMAIN, rē-māne'. s. (202). Relick, that which is left, generally used in the plural; the body left by the soul.

REMAINDER, rē-māne'dŭr. s. What is left; the body when the soul is departed, remains.

To REMAKE, rē-māke'. v. a. To make anew.

To REMAND, rē-mānd'. v. a. (79). To send back, to call back.

REMANENT, rĕm'mā-nĕnt. s. The part remaining.

☞ I place the accent on the first syllable of this word, for the same reason as in Permanent; the a in both remaneo and permaneo is short, if that be any rule. See Principles, No. 503. (e.) It is highly probable that Remnant is but an abbreviation of the present word.

REMARK, rē-mārk'. s. (78). Observation, note, notice taken.

To REMARK, rē-mārk'. v. a. To note, to observe; to distinguish, to point out, to mark.

REMARKABLE, rē-mārk'ā-bl. a. Observable, worthy of note.

REMEDIATE, rē-mē'dē-āt. a. (91). Medicinal, affording a remedy.

REMEDILESS, rĕm'mē-dē-lĕs. a. Not admitting remedy, irreparable, cureless.

☞ Spencer and Milton place the accent upon the second syllable of this word; and as Mr. Nares observes, Dr. Johnson has, on the authority of these authors, adopted this accentuation. "But this," says Mr. Nares, "is irregular; for every monosyllabic termination added to a word accented on the antepenult, throws the accent to the fourth syllable from the end." With great respect for Mr. Nares's opinion on this subject, I should think a much easier and more general rule might be laid down for all words of this kind, which is, that these words which take the Saxon terminations after them, as er, less, ness, lessness, ly, &c. preserve the accent of the radical word; therefore this and the following word ought to have the same accent as remedy, from which they are formed. See Principles, No. 489, 501.

REMEDILESSNESS, rĕm'ē-dē-lĕs-nĕs. s. Incurableness.

REMEDY, rĕm'mē-dē. s. A medicine by which any illness is cured; cure of any uneasiness; that which counteracts any evil; reparation, means of repairing any hurt.

REMORSE, rĕ-mŏrse', or rĕ-mōrse'. Pain of guilt; anguish of a guilty conscience.

☞ Dr. Kenrick, Mr. Nares, Mr. Perry, and several respectable speakers, pronounce this word in the second manner; but Mr. Sheridan, Mr. Scott, W. Johnston, and Mr. Smith, in the first; and, in my opinion, with analogy and the best usage on their side. The final e does not lengthen the o, but serves only to keep the s from going into the sound of z.

REMORSEFUL, rĕ-mŏrs'fŭl. a. Tender, compassionate. Not used.

REMORSELESS, rĕ-mŏrs'lĕs. a. Unpitying, cruel, savage.

To RENDEZVOUS, rĕn-dĕ-vōōz'. v. n. To meet at a place appointed.

☞ This word is in such universal use as to be perfectly anglicised; and those who leave out the s at the end, in compliment to the French language, show but little taste in their pronunciation of English. To this letter, in this word, as well as in several other words, may be applied the judicious advice of Pope:

"In words as fashions the same rule will "hold;
"Alike fantastic, if too new or old:
"Be not the first by whom the new are
"try'd,
"Nor yet the last to lay the old aside."
Essay on Criticism.

RENDITION, rĕn-dish'ŭn. s. Surrendering, the act of yielding.

RENEGADE, rĕn'nĕ-gāde. } s. One

To RENEW, rĕ-nū'. v. a. To restore to the former state; to repeat, to put again in act; to begin again; in Theology, to make anew, to transform to new life.

RENEWABLE, rĕ-nū'ă-bl. a. Capable of being renewed.

RENEWAL, rĕ-nū'ăl. s. (88). The act of renewing; renovation.

RENITENCY, rĕ-nī'tĕn-sĕ. s. That resistance in solid bodies, when they press upon, or are impelled one against another.

☞ This word and the following were in Dr. Johnson's third edition, folio, accented on the second syllable; but in the sixth edition, quarto, they have the accent on the first. This latter accentuation, it must be allowed, is more agreeable to English analogy, (see Principles, No. 503, b;) but there is an analogy that the Learned are very fond of adopting which is, that when a word from the Latin contains the same number of syllables as the original, the accent of the original should then be preserved; and as the accent of renitens is on the second syllable, the word renitent ought to have the accent on the second likewise. For my own part, I approve of our own analogy, both in accent and quantity; but it is the business of a Prosodist to give the usage as well as analogy: and were this word and its formative renitency to be brought into common use, I have no doubt but that the Latin analogy, that of accenting this word on the second syllable, would generally prevail. This may fairly be presumed from the suffrages we have for it; namely, Mr. Sheridan, Dr. Kenrick, Dr. Ash, Buchanan, and Entick, who are opposed by no Dictionary I have consulted but by Scott's Bailey.

RENITENT, rĕ-nī'tĕnt. a. Acting against any impulse by elastick power.

RENNET, rĕn'nĭt. s.—See RUNNET. The ingredient with which milk is coagulated in order to make cheese; a kind of apple.

RESOLUBLE, rĕz'ŏ-lū-bl. a. That may be melted or dissolved.

☞ I have placed the accent on the first syllable of this word, for the same reason which induced me to place it on the first of Dissoluble.

I have differed from some of our orthöepists in this accentuation, and the uncertainty that reigns among them will be a sufficient apology for having recourse to analogy, which is clearly shown by the accent which all of them place upon the second syllable of Indis'soluble.

Dis'soluble, Sheridan, Ash, Buchanan, W. Johnston, Perry, Entick, Dr. Johnson's quarto.

To RESORT, rē-zŏrt'. v. n. To have recourse to; to frequent; to repair to; to fall back; a term in law.

☞ Some speakers pronounce this word so as to rhyme with sport; but as this is not the most usual pronunciation, so it is not the most agreeable to analogy. That it is not the most usual, appears from the testimony of Sheridan, Kenrick, Scott, Smith, W. Johnston, and Perry, who pronounce it as I have done.

RESPECTABLE, rē-spĕk'tâ-bl. a. Deserving of respect or regard.

☞ This word, like several others of the same form, is frequently distorted by an accent on the first syllable. When there are no uncombinable consonants in the latter syllable, this accentuation is not improper, as despicable, disputable, preferable, &c.; but when consonants of so different an organ as ct and pt occur in the penultimate and antepenultimate syllables of words without the accent, the difficulty of pronouncing them is a sufficient reason for placing the accent on them in order to assist the pronunciation; and accordingly we find almost every word of this form has the accent upon these letters, as delectible, destructible, perceptible, susceptible, discerptible, &c.; besides, as it contributes greatly to place the accent on the most significant part of the word, when other reasons do not forbid, this ought to determine us to lay the stress upon the second syllable of the word in question. This is the accentuation of Mr. Scott, Mr. Buchanan, W. Johnston, Bailey, and Entick; and if Dr. Johnson, Mr. Sheridan, Dr. Ash, Dr. Kenrick, Barclay, Fenning, and Perry, had inserted the word in their Dictionaries, they would, in all probability, have accented the word in the same manner. Since the first edition of this Dictionary, I see this is the case with the quarto edition of Dr. Johnson.—See ACCEPTABLE, CORRUPTIBLE, and IRREFRAGABLE.

RESPECTER, rē-spĕkt'ŭr. s. (98). One that has partial regard.

RESPECTFUL, rē-spĕkt'fŭl. a. Ceremonious, full of outward civility.

RESPECTFULLY, rē-spĕkt'fŭl-ē. ad. With some degree of reverence.

RESPECTIVE, rē-spĕk'tĭv. a. (512). Particular, relating to particular persons or things, belonging to each; relative, not absolute.

RESPECTIVELY, rē-spĕk'tĭv-lē. ad. Particularly, as each belongs to each; relatively, not absolutely.

RESPERSION, rē-spĕr'shŭn. s. The act of sprinkling.

RESPIRATION, rĕs-pē-rā'shŭn. s. The act of breathing; relief from toil.

To RESPIRE, rē-spīre'. v. n. To breathe; to catch breath; to rest, to take rest from toil.

RESPITE, rĕs'pĭt. s. (140). Reprieve, suspension of a capital sentence; pause, interval.

REST, rĕst. s. Sleep, repose; the final sleep, the quietness of death; stillness, cessation of motion; quiet, peace, cessation from disturbance; cessation from bodily labour; support, that on which any thing leans or rests; place of repose; final hope; remainder, what remains.

REST, rĕst. s. Others, those which remain.

To REST, rĕst. v. a. To sleep, to slumber; to die; to be at quiet; to be without motion, to be still; to be fixed in any state or opinion; to cease from labour; to be satisfied, to acquiesce; to lean, to be supported; to be left, to remain.

To REST, rĕst. v. a. To lay to rest; to place as on a support.

RESTAGNANT, rĕ-stăg'nănt. a. Remaining without flow or motion.

To RESTAGNATE, rĕ-stăg'nāte. v. a. To stand without flow.

RESTAGNATION, rĕ-stăg-nā'shŭn. s. The state of standing without flow, course, or motion.

RESTAURATION, rĕs-tā-rā'shŭn. s. The act of recovering to the former state.

☞ This word, though regularly formed from the Latin Restauratio, is now entirely out of use, and Restoration immoveably fixed in its place.

To RESTEM, rĕ-stĕm'. v. a. To force back against the current.

RESTFUL, rĕst'fŭl. a. Quiet, being at rest.

RESTHARROW, rĕst-hăr'rō. s. A plant.

RESTIFF, rĕs'tĭf. a. Unwilling to stir, resolute against going forward, stubborn; being at rest, being less in motion.

☞ There is a deviation from propriety in the use of this word almost too vulgar to deserve notice, and that is denominating any thing stubborn or unruly rusty. Shakespeare, Swift, and Davenant, as we see in Johnson, have used the word resty: but this is an evident corruption of the French word restiff, and should be totally laid aside.

RESTIFNESS, rĕs'tĭf-nĕs. s. Obstinate reluctance.

RESTINCTION, rĕ-stĭngk'shŭn. s. The act of extinguishing.

RESTITUTION, rĕs-tĕ-tū'shŭn. s. The act of restoring what is lost or taken away; the act of recovering its former state or posture.

RESTLESS, rĕst'lĕs. a. Being without sleep; unquiet, without peace; inconstant, unsettled; not still, in continual motion.

RESTLESSLY, rĕst'lĕs-lĕ. ad. Without rest, unquietly.

RESTLESSNESS, rĕst'lĕs-nĕs. s. Want of sleep; want of rest, unquietness; motion, agitation.

RESTORABLE, rĕ-stŏ'rā-bl. a. What may be restored.

RESTORATION, rĕs-tŏ-rā'shŭn. s. The act of replacing in a former state; recovery.

RESTORATIVE, rĕ-stŏ'rā-tĭv. a. That which has the power to recruit life.

RESTORATIVE, rĕ-stŏ'rā-tĭv. s. (512). A medicine that has the power of recruiting life.

To RESTORE, rĕ-stōre'. v. a. To give back what has been lost or taken away; to bring back; to retrieve; to bring back from degeneration, declension, or ruin, to its former state; to recover passages in books from corruption.

RESTORER, rĕ-stŏ'rŭr. s. (98). One that restores.

To RESTRAIN, rĕ-strāne'. v. a. To withhold, to keep in; to repress, to keep RESTRICTIVELY, rē-strĭk'tĭv-lē. ad. With limitation.

To RESTRINGE, rē-strĭnje'. v. a. To limit, to confine.

RESTRINGENT, rē-strĭn'jĕnt. s. That which hath the power of restraining.

RESTY, rĕs'tē. a.—See RESTIFF. Obstinate in standing still.

To RESUBLIME, rē-sŭb-līme'. v. a. To sublime another time.

To RESULT, rē-zŭlt'. v. n. (445). To fly back; to rise as a consequence; to be produced as the effect of causes jointly concurring; to arise as a conclusion from premises.

RESULT, rē-zŭlt'. s. Resilience, act of flying back; consequence, effect produced by the concurrence of co-operating causes; inference from premises; resolve, decision.

RESUMABLE, rē-zū'mā-bl. a. What may be taken back.

To RESUME, rē-zūme'. v. a. (445). To take back what has been given; to take back what has been taken away; to take again; to begin again what was broken off, as to resume a discourse.

RESUMPTION, rē-zŭm'shŭn. s. (412). The act of resuming.

RESUMPTIVE, rē-zŭm'tĭv. a. Taking back.

RESUPINATION, rē-sū-pē-nā'shŭn. s. (446). The act of lying on the back.

To RESURVEY, rē-sŭr-vā'. v. a. To review, to survey again.

RESURRECTION, rĕz-ŭr-rĕk'shŭn. s. (415). Revival from the dead, return from the grave.

To RESUSCITATE, rē-sŭs'sē-tāte. v. a. (446). To stir up anew, to revive.

RESUSCITATION, rē-sŭs-sē-tā'shŭn. s. The act of stirring up anew; the act of reviving, or state of being revived.

To RETAIL, rē-tāle'. v. a. (202). To divide into small parcels; to sell in small quantities; to sell at second hand; to sell in broken parts.

☞ This verb and noun may be classed with those in Principles, No, 492: though the verb is sometimes accented on the first syllable, and the noun on the last.

RETAIL, rē'tāle. s. Sale by small quantities.

RETAILER, rē-tā'lŭr. s. One who sells by small quantities.

To RETAIN, rē-tāne'. v. a. (202). To keep, to keep in mind; to keep in pay, to hire.

RETAINER, rē-tā'nŭr. s. (98). An adherent, a dependant, a hanger-on; the act of keeping dependants, or being in dependance.

To RETAKE, rē-tāke'. v. a. To take again.

To RETALIATE, rē-tăl'ē-āte. v. a. (113). To return by giving like for like, to repay, to requite.

RETALIATION, rē-tăl-ē-ā'shŭn. s. Requital, return of like for like.

To RETARD, rē-tărd'. v. a. To hinder, to obstruct in swiftness of course; to delay, to put off.

To RETARD, rē-tărd'. v. n. To stay back.

RETARDATION, rēt-tăr-dā'shŭn. s. (530). Hindrance, the act of delaying.

RETARDER, rē-tărd'ŭr. s. (98). Hinderer, obstructer.

To RETCH, rĕtsh, or rētsh. v. a. To force up something from the stomach.

☞ This word is derived from the same Saxon original as the verb to reach, and seems to signify the same action; the one implying the extension of the arm; and the other, of the throat or lungs. No good reason, therefore, appears either for spelling or pronouncing them differently; and though Dr. Johnson has made a distinction in the orthography, the pronunciation of both is generally the same.

RETCHLESS, rĕtsh'lĕs. a. Careless. Not used.

RETECTION, rē-tĕk'shŭn. s. The act of discovering to the view.

RETENTIVENESS, rè-tĕn'tĭv-nĕs. s. Having the quality of retention.

RETICENCE, rĕt'tè-sĕnse. s. Concealment by silence.

RETICLE, rĕt'è-kl. s. (405). A small net.

RETICULAR, rè-tĭk'ù-lăr. a. Having the form of a small net.

RETICULATED, rè-tĭk'ù-là-tĕd. a. Made of network.

RETIFORM, rĕt'tè-fôrm. a. Having the form of a net.

RETINUE, rĕt'è-nù, or rè-tĭn'nù. s. A number attending upon a principal person, a train.

☞ This word was formerly always accented on the second syllable; but the antepenultimate accent, to which our language is so prone in simples of three syllables, has so generally obtained as to make it doubtful to which side the best usage inclines. Dr. Johnson, Sheridan, Ash, Kenrick, Nares, Bailey, and Fenning, accent the second syllable; and Buchanan, W. Johnston, Perry, Barclay, and Entick, the first. Scott accents both, but prefers the first. In this case, then, analogy ought to decide for placing the accent on the first syllable. See Principles, No. 535, and the word REVENUE.

To RETIRE, rè-tīre'. v. n. To retreat, to withdraw, to go to a place of privacy; to retreat from danger; to go from a publick station; to go off from company.

To RETIRE, rè-tīre'. v. a. To withdraw, to take away.

RETIRE, rè-tīre'. s. Retreat, retirement. Not in use.

RETIRED, rè-tīr'd'. part. a. Secret, private.

RETIREDNESS, rè-tīr'd'nĕs. s. Solitude, privacy, secrecy.

RETIREMENT, rè-tīre'mĕnt. s. Private abode, secret habitation; private way of life; act of withdrawing.

RETOLD, rè-tōld'. Part. pass. of Retell. Related or told again.

To RETORT, rè-tôrt'. v. a. To throw back; to return any argument, censure, or incivility; to curve back.

RETORT, rè-tôrt'. s. A censure or incivility returned; a chymical glass vessel with a bent neck to which the receiver is fitted.

RETORTER, rè-tôrt'ŭr. s. (98). One that retorts.

RETORTION, rè-tôr'shŭn. s. The act of retorting.

To RETOSS, rè-tŏss'. v. a. To toss back.

To RETOUCH, rè-tŭtsh'. v. a. To improve by new touches.

To RETRACE, rè-trāse'. v. a. To trace back.

To RETRACT, rè-trăkt'. v. a. To recall, to recant.

To RETREAT, rè-trēte'. v. n. To go to a private abode; to take shelter, to go to a place of security; to retire from a superior enemy; to go out of the former place.

RETREATED, rè-trē'tĕd. part. ad. Retired, gone to privacy.

To RETRENCH, rè-trĕnsh'. v. a. To cut off, to pare away; to confine.

To RETRENCH, rè-trĕnsh'. v. a. }
To RETRENCH, rè-trĕnsh'. v. n. }
To live with less magnificence or elegance.

RETRENCHMENT, rè-trĕnsh'mĕnt. s. The act of lopping away.

To RETRIBUTE, rè-trĭb'ūte. v. a. To pay back, to make repayment of.

☞ I have differed from Dr. Johnson, Mr. Sheridan, and almost all our orthoëpists, in giving the accent to the second syllable of the word in preference to the first. But while the verbs attribute, contribute, and distribute, have the penultimate accent, it seems absurd not to give retribute the same.

RETRIBUTION, rĕt-trè-bū'shŭn. s. Repayment, return accommodated to the action.

RETRIBUTIVE, rè-trĭb'ù-tĭv. (512). }
RETRIBUTORY, rè-trĭb'ù-tŭr-è. }
s. Repaying, making repayment.

RETRIEVABLE, rè-trēev-ă-bl. a. That may be retrieved.

REVENGEMENT, rē-vĕnje'mĕnt. s. Vengeance, return of an injury.

REVENGINGLY, rē-vĕn'jĭng-lē. ad. With vengeance, vindictively.

REVENUE, rĕv'ē-nū, or rē-vĕn'ū. s. Income, annual profits received from lands or other funds.

☞ This word seems as nearly balanced between the accent on the first and second syllable as possible; but as it is of the same form and origin as avenue and retinue, it ought to follow the same fortune. Retinue seems to have been long inclining to accent the first syllable, and avenue has decidedly done so, since Dr. Watts observed that it was sometimes accented on the second: and by this retrocession of accent, as it may be called, we may easily foresee that these three words will uniformly yield to the antepenultimate accent, the favourite accent of our language, conformably to the general rule, which accents simples of three syllables upon the first. Dr. Johnson, Mr. Nares, and Bailey, are for the accent on the second syllable; but Dr. Ash, Dr. Kenrick, Buchanan, W. Johnston, Perry, Barclay, Fenning, and Entick, accent the first. Mr. Sheridan gives both, but places the antepenultimate accent first (503). See CONVERSANT and RETINUE.

REVERY, rêv'êr-ê. s. Loose musing, irregular thought.

☞ This word seems to have been some years floating between the accent on the first and last syllable, but to have settled at last on the former. It may still, however, be reckoned among those words, which, if occasion require, admit of either. See Principles, No. 528. It may, perhaps, be necessary to observe, that some Lexicographers have written this word Reverie instead of Revery, and that while it is thus written we may place the accent either on the first or last syllable; but if we place the accent on the last of Revery, and pronounce the y like e, there arises an irregularity which forbids it; for y, with the accent on it, is never so pronounced. Dr. Johnson's orthography, therefore, with y in the last syllable, and Mr. Sheridan's accent on the first, seem to be the most correct mode of writing and pronouncing this word.

A view of the different orthography and accentuation of this word may contribute to confirm that which I have chosen:

Re'very, Sheridan, W. Johnston, Barclay.
Revery', Johnson's quarto, Entick.
Reverie', Buchanan.
Reve'ry, Kenrick, Johnson's folio.
Reve'ries, Bailey.
Re'verie', Perry.

RHOMB, rŭmb. s. A parallelogram or quadrangular figure having its four sides equal, and consisting of parallel lines, with two opposite angles acute, and two obtuse.

☞ I have here differed from Mr. Sheridan, and adopted that sound of the vowel in this word which is given to it by Dr. Kenrick, Mr. Scott, Mr. Smith, and Mr. Perry. This I do not only suppose to be the general pronunciation, but find it written rhumb by Dr. Ash, Buchanan, and Barclay. But when this word is given us in its Latin form Rhombus, the o ought to have the same sound as in comedy. See Principles, No. 347.

RHOMBICK, rŭm'bĭk. a. Shaped like a rhomb.

RHOMBOID, rŭm'bŏĭd. s. A figure approaching to a rhomb.

RIDGY, rĭd'jē. a. Rising in a ridge.

RIDICULE, rĭd'ē-kūle. s. Wit of that species which provokes laughter.

☞ This word is frequently mispronounced by sounding the first syllable like the adjective red; an inaccuracy which cannot be too carefully avoided.

I am of the same opinion as Mr. Nares, that this word was anciently accented on the last syllable as derived from the French ridicule, and not the Latin ridiculus: but this accent being found contrary to the Latin analogy (503) shifted to the first syllable; a transition which, in words of three syllables, is the easiest thing in the world. See Principles, No. 524.

To RIDICULE, rĭd'ē-kūle. v. a. To expose to laughter, to treat with contemptuous merriment.

ROMAN, rō'mān. a. (88). Belonging to Rome.

ROME, rōōm. s. The capital city of Italy, supposed to have been founded by Romulus, and once the mistress of the world. Ash.

☞ The o in this word is irrevocably fixed in the English sound of that letter in move, prove, &c. Pope, indeed, rhymes it with dome,

"Thus when we view some well-proportion'd dome,
"The world's just wonder, and ev'n thine, O Rome!——

But, as Mr. Nares observes, it is most probable that he pronounced this word as if written doom, as he rhymes Rome with doom afterwards in the same poem.

"From the same foes at last both felt their doom;
"And the same age saw learning fall and Rome."

Essay on Criticism, v. 685.

The truth is, nothing certain can be concluded from the rhyming of poets. It may serve to confirm an established usage, but can never direct us where usage is various and uncertain. But the pun which Shakespeare puts into the mouth of Cassius in Julius Cæsar decidedly shows what was the pronunciation of this word in his time:

"Now it is Rome, indeed, and room enough,
"When there is in it but one only man."

And the Grammar in Queen Anne's time, recommended by Steele, says, the city Rome is pronounced like Room; and Dr. Jones in his Spelling Dictionary, 1704, gives it the same sound.

☞ Upon a more accurate observation of the best usage, I must give the preference to the first sound of this word, notwithstanding its coincidence in sound with another word of a different meaning; the fewer French sounds of this diphthong we have in our language, the better; nor does there appear any necessity for retaining the final e. See BOWL. Mr. Sheridan and Mr. Smith make a difference between rout a rabble, and route a road; Mr. Scott gives both sounds, but seems to prefer the first; W. Johnston, Dr. Kenrick, and Mr. Perry, pronounce both alike, and with the first sound.

SACRAMENT, sāk'krā-mĕnt. s. An oath, any ceremony producing an obligation; an outward and visible sign of an inward and spiritual grace; the eucharist, the holy communion.

☞ This word, with sacrifice, sacrilege, and sacristy, is sometimes pronounced with the a in the first syllable long, as in sacred; but this is contrary to one of the clearest analogies in the language, which is, that the antepenultimate accent in simples, not followed by a diphthong, always shortens the vowel it falls upon. See Principles, No. 503.

Mr. Elphinston, Mr. Sheridan, Mr. Scott, W. Johnston, Kenrick, Perry, and Entick, pronounce these words as I have marked them.

SACRAMENTAL, sāk-krā-mĕnt'āl. a. Constituting a sacrament, pertaining to a sacrament.

SAIK, sā'ik. s. A Turkish vessel proper for the carriage of merchandize.

SAID, sĕd. (203) (222). Pret. and Part. pass. of Say. Aforesaid; declared, showed.

☞ This word, with paid and laid, are a scandal to our orthography. It appeared so to Cooke, the translator of Hesiod, who spelled them regularly sayed, payed, and layed. "Perseus is sayed to have been "sent by Pallas to slay Medusa," &c. page 156.

SAIL, sāle. s. (202). The expanded sheet which catches the wind and carries on the vessel through the water; wings; a ship, a vessel; Sail is a collective word, noting the number of ships; To strike sail, to lower the sails; a proverbial phrase for abating of pomp or superiority.

To SAIL, sāle. v. a. To pass by means of sails; to fly through.

SAILER, SAILOR, sā'lŭr. s. (166). A seaman, who one practises or understands navigation.

☞ The first of these words is generally applied to the Ship, and the second to the Mariner. Whatever may be the reason for this distinction to the eye, the ear is quite insensible of it, and the Ship and the Man are both pronounced alike. See Principles, No. 415.

SAILYARD, sāle'yārd. s. The pole on which the sail is extended.

SAINFOIN, sān'fŏin. s. A kind of herb.

SAINT, sānt. s. (202). A person eminent for piety and virtue.

SALEWORK, sāle'wŭrk. s. Works for sale, work carelessly done.

SALIENT, sā'lē-ĕnt. a. (113). Leaping, bounding; beating, panting, springing or shooting with a quick motion.

SALINE, sā-līne', or sā-līne. a. Consisting of salt.

☞ As this word is derived from the Latin salinus by dropping a syllable, the accent ought, according to the general rule of formation (503), to remove to the first. This accentuation, however, is adopted only by Dr. Johnson, Buchanan, and Bailey; as Sheridan, Kenrick, Ash, Nares, W. Johnston, Scott, Perry, Barclay, Fenning, Entick, and Smith, accent the second syllable.

SALINOUS, sā-lī'nŭs. Consisting of salt, constituting salt.

☞ Dr. Johnson, in his folio Dictionary, accents this word on the first syllable, in which he is followed by his publishers in the quarto: but as this word may be easily derived from the Latin word salinus, and with the same number of syllables, it ought to be accented on the second. (503, e.)

SALIVA, sā-lī'vā. s. (503, b.) Every thing that is spit up, but it more strictly signifies that juice which is separated by the glands called salival.

☞ As this word is a perfect Latin word, all our Dictionaries very properly accent it on the second syllable (503). But salival, which is a formative of our own, has no such title to the penultimate accent: this pronunciation, however, is adopted by Mr. Sheridan, Dr. Ash, Dr. Kenrick, Scott, Barclay, Fenning, Entick, and Johnson's quarto; but Mr. Perry and Dr. Johnson's folio place the accent on the first syllable, and, in my opinion, more correctly.

SALIVAL, sāl'ē-văl, or sā-lī'văl. } a.
SALIVARY, sāl'ē-vā-rē. }
Relating to spittle.—See SALIVA.

To SALIVATE, sāl'lē-vāte. v. a. To purge by the salival glands.

SALIVATION, sāl-lē-vā'shŭn. s. A method of cure much practised in venereal cases.

SALIVOUS, sā-lī'vŭs, or sāl'ē-vŭs. a. Consisting of spittle, having the nature of spittle.—See Principles, No. 103, p.

☞ As this word has somewhat more of a Latin aspect than salival, and is probably derived from salivosus, the learnedly polite, or the politely learned, snatch at the shadow of Latin quantity to distinguish themselves from mere English speakers. Hence in all the words of this termination they perserve the penultimate i long, and place the accent on it; and thus we are obliged to do the same in this word under pain of appearing illiterate. This penalty, however, Dr. Ash and Mr. Perry have incurred, by placing the accent on the first syllable; but Dr. Johnson, Mr. Sheridan, Mr. Scott, Barclay, Fenning, and Entick, follow the learned majority, though evidently wrong.

SALLET, sāl'lĭt. (99). } s. Corrupted from salad.
SALLETING, sāl'lĭt-ĭng. }

SALT-PIT, sâlt'pĭt. } salt is got.

SALTATION, sâl-tā'shŭn. s. (84). The act of dancing or jumping; beat, palpitation.

☞ As this word comes immediately from the Latin, and the t is carried off to commence the second syllable, the a has not the broad sound as in salt, but goes into the general sound of that letter; in the same manner as the u in fulminate, is not pronounced like the peculiar sound of that letter in full, but like the u in dull (177).

SALTCAT, sâlt'kăt. s. A lump of salt.

SALVATORY, sâl'vă-tŭr-ĕ. s. (512). A place where any thing is preserved.

SALUBRIOUS, să-lū'brĕ-ŭs. a. Wholesome, healthful, promoting health.

SALUBRITY, să-lū'brĕ-tĕ. s. Wholesomeness, healthfulness.

SALVE, sâlv. s. (78). A glutinous matter applied to wounds and hurts, an emplaster; help, remedy.

☞ Dr. Johnson tells us, that this word is originally and properly salf, which having salves in the plural, the singular, in time, was borrowed from it: sealf, Saxon, undoubtedly from salvus, Latin. There is some diversity among our orthöepists about the l in this word and its verb. Mr Sheridan marks it to be pronounced; Mr. Smith, W. Johnston, and Barclay, make it mute; Mr. Scott and Perry give it both ways; and Mr. Nares says it is mute in the noun, but sounded in the verb. The mute l is certainly countenanced in this word by calve and halve; but as they are very irregular, and are the only words where the l is silent in this situation, for valve, delve, solve, &c. have the l pronounced; and as this word is of Latin original, the l ought certainly to be preserved in both words: for to have the same word sounded differently, to signify different things, is a defect in language that ought as much as possible to be avoided.—See BOWL and FAULT.

To SALVE, sâlv. v. a. To cure with medicaments applied; to help, to remedy; to help or save by a salvo, an excuse, or reservation.

SALVER, sâl'vŭr. s. (98). A plate on which any thing is presented.

SANABLE, sān'nā-bl. a. (535). Curable, susceptive of remedy, remediable.

☞ Mr. Nares, Buchanan, and W. Johnston, pronounce the a in the first syllable of this word long; but Mr. Sheridan, Mr. Scott, and Entick, more properly, short. Buchanan only makes the same a in sanative long; but Mr. Sheridan, Scott, W. Johnston, Perry, and Entick, short. Mr. Sheridan and Buchanan are the only orthoepists from whom we can gather the sound of this vowel in insanable, which the latter marks long, and the former short as it ought to be, from the shortening power of the antepenultimate accent.—See GRANARY.

SAT, sāt. The pret. of Sit.

SATAN, sā'tān, or sāt'tān. s. The prince of hell, any wicked spirit.

☞ This word is frequently pronounced as if written Sattan; but making the first syllable long is so agreeable to analogy that it ought to be indulged wherever custom will permit, and particularly in proper names. Cato, Plato, &c. have now universally the penultimate a long and slender; and no good reason can be given why the word in question should not join this class: if the short quantity of the a in the original be alledged, for an answer to this see Principles, No. 544, and the word SATIRE. Mr. Nares and Buchanan only adopt the second sound; and Mr. Elphinston, Mr. Sheridan, Dr. Kenrick, Mr. Scott, W. Johnston, Mr. Perry, Entick, and, if we may judge by the position of the accent, Dr. Ash and Bailey, the first.—See The Key to the Classical Pronunciation of Greek, Latin, and Scripture Proper Names, under the word.

To SATE, sāte. v. a. To satiate, to glut, to pall, to feed beyond natural desires.

SATELLITE, săt'tĕl-līte. s. (155). A small planet revolving round a larger.

☞ Pope has, by the license of his art, accented the plural of this word upon the second syllable, and like the Latin plural, has given it four syllables:

"Or ask of yonder argent fields above,
"Why Jove's Satellites are less than Jove."
Essay on Man.

This, however, is only pardonable in poetry, and, it may be added, in good poetry.

—See ANTIPODES and MILLIPEDES.

SATELLITIOUS, săt-tĕl-lĭsh'ŭs. a. Consisting of satellites.

To SATIATE, să'shē-āte. v. a. To satisfy, to fill; to glut, to pall; to gratify desire; to saturate, to impregnate with as much as can be contained or imbibed.

SATIATE, să'shē-āte. a. (91). Glutted, full to satiety.

SATIETY, să-tī'ĕ-tē. s. (460). Fulness beyond desire or pleasure, more than enough, state of being palled.

☞ The sound of the second syllable of this word has been grossly mistaken by the generality of speakers; nor is it much to be wondered at. Ti, with the accent on it, succeeded by a vowel, is a very uncommon predicament for an English syllable to be under; and therefore it is not surprising that it has been almost universally confounded with an apparently similar, but really different, assemblage of accent, vowels and consonants. So accustomed is the ear to the aspirated sound of t, when followed by two vowels, that whenever these appear we are apt to annex the very same sound to that letter, without attending to an essential circumstance in this word, which distinguishes it from every other in the language. There is no English word of exactly the same form with satiety, and therefore it cannot, like most other words, be tried by its peers; but analogy, that grand resource of reason, will as clearly determine, in this case, as if the most positive evidence were produced.

In the first place, then, the sound commonly given to the second syllable of this word, which is that of the first of si-lence, as if written sa-si-e-ty, is never found annexed to the same letters throughout the whole language. Ti, when succeeded by two vowels, in every instance but the word in question, sounds exactly like sh; thus satiate, expatiate, &c. are pronounced as if written sa-she-ate, ex-pa-she-ate, &c. and not sa-se-ate, ex-pa-se-ate, &c. and therefore if the t must be aspirated in this word, it ought at least to assume that aspiration which is found among similar assemblages of letters, and instead of sa-si-e-ty, it ought to be sounded sa-shi-e-ty: in this mode of pronunciation a greater parity might be pleaded; nor should we introduce a new aspiration to reproach our language with needless irregularity. But if we once cast an eye on those conditions, on which we give an aspirated sound to the dentals (26), we shall find both these methods of pronouncing this word equally remote from analogy. In almost every termination where the consonants, t, d, c, and s, precede the vowels ea, ia, ie, io, &c. as in martial, soldier, suspicion, confusion, anxious, prescience, &c. the accent is on the syllable immediately before these consonants, and they all assume the aspiration; but in Ægyptiacum, elephantiasis, hendiadis, society, anxiety, science, &c. the accent is immediately after these consonants, and t, d, c, and x, are pronounced as free from aspiration as the same letters in tiar, diet, cion, Ixion, &c. the position of the accent makes the whole difference. But if analogy in our own language were silent, the uniform pronunciation of words from the learned languages, where these letters occur, would be sufficient to decide the dispute. Thus in elephantiasis, Miltiades, satietas, &c. the antepenultimate syllable ti is always pronounced like the English noun tie; nor should we dream of giving ti the aspirated sound in these words, though there would be exactly the same reason for it as in satiety: for, except in very few instances, as we pronounce Latin in the analogy of our own language, no reason can be given why we should pronounce the antepenultimate syllable in satietas one way, and that in satiety another.

I should have thought my time thrown away in so minute an investigation of the pronunciation of this word, if I had not found the best judges disagree about it. That Mr. Sheridan supposed it ought to be pronounced sa-si-e-ty, is evident from his giving this word as an instance of the various sounds of t, and telling us that here it sounds s. Mr. Garrick, whom I consulted on this word, told me, if there were any rules for pronunciation, I was certainly right in mine; but that he and his literary acquaintance pronounced in the other manner. Dr. Johnson likewise thought I was right, but that the greater number of speakers were against me; and Dr. Lowth told me, he was clearly of my opinion, but that he could get nobody to follow him. I was much flattered to find my sentiments confirmed by so great a judge, and much more flattered when I found my reasons were entirely new to him.

But, notwithstanding the tide of opinion was some years ago so much against me, I have since had the pleasure of finding some of the most judicious philologists on my side. Mr. Elphinston, Dr. Kenrick, and Mr. Perry, mark the word as I have done; and Mr. Nares is of opinion it ought to be so pronounced, though for a reason very different from those I have produced, namely, in order to keep it as distinct as may be from the word society. While Mr. Fry frankly owns, it is very difficult to determine the proper pronunciation of this word.

Thus I have ventured to decide where "Doctors disagree," and have been induced to spend so much time on the correction of this word, as the improper pronunciation of it does not, as in most other cases, proceed from an evident caprice of custom, as in busy and bury, or from a desire of drawing nearer to the original language, but from an absolute mistake of the principles on which we pronounce our own.

SATIN, săt'ĭn. s. A soft, close, and shining silk.

SATIRE, să'tŭr, săt'ŭr, să'tīre, or săt'īre. s. A poem in which wickedness or folly are censured.

☞ The first mode of pronouncing this word is adopted by Mr. Sheridan, Mr. Scott, Dr. Ash, and Mr. Smith. The short quantity of the first vowel is adopted by Mr. Nares, Mr. Elphinston, Buchanan, and Entick; but the quantity of the second syllable they have not marked. —The third is adopted by Mr. Perry and Dr. Kenrick; and for the fourth we have no authorities.

But though the first mode of pronouncing this word is the most general, and the most agreeable to an English ear, the second seems to be that which is most favoured by the learned, because, say they, the first syllable in the Latin Satyra is short. But if this reasoning were to hold good, we ought to pronounce the first syllable of silence, local, label, libel, locust, paper, and many others short, because silentium, localis, labellum, libellus, locusta, papyrus, &c. have all the first syllable short in Latin. But to furnish the learned with an argument which perhaps may not immediately occur to them, it may be said, that in the instances I have adduced none of the Latin words have the initial syllable accented as well as short, which is the case with the word satyra: but it may be answered, if we were to follow the quantity of the Latin accented vowel, we must pronounce foeted, mimic, frigid, squalid, comic, resin, credit, spirit, and lily, with the first vowel long, because it is the case in the Latin words foetidus, mimicus, frigidus, squalidus, comicus, resina, creditus, spiritus, and lilium.

The only shadow of an argument therefore that remains is, that though we do not adopt the Latin quantity of the accented antepenultimate vowel when it is long, we do when it is short. For though we have many instances where an English word of two syllables has the first short, though derived from a Latin word where the two first syllables are long; as civil, legate, solemn, &c. from civilis, legatus, solemnis, &c. yet we have no instance in the language where a word of three syllables in Latin with the two first vowels short, becomes an English dissyllable with the first syllable long. Hence the shortness of the first syllables of platane, zephyr, atom, &c. from platanus, zephyrus, atomus, &c. which are short, not only from the custom of carrying the short sound we give to the Latin antepenultimate vowel into the penultimate of the English word derived from it, but from the affectation of shortening the initial vowel, which this custom has introduced, in order to give our pronunciation a Latin air, and furnish us with an opportunity of showing our learning by appealing to Latin quantity; which, when applied to English, is so vague and uncertain, as to put us out of all fear of detection if we happen to be wrong. The absurd custom, therefore, of shortening our vowels, ought to be discountenanced as much as possible, since it is supported by such weak and desultory arguments; and our own analogy in this as well as in similar words, ought to be preferred to such a shadow of analogy to the quantity of the Latin language, as I have charitably afforded to those who are ignorant of it.—See Principles, No. 544.

With respect to the quantity of the last syllable, though custom seems to have decided it in this word, it is not so certain in other words of a similar form. These we purpose to consider under the word UMPIRE, which see.

SATIRICAL, să-tĭr'ĕ-kăl. } a. Belonging to satire, employed in writing of invective; censorious, severe in language.

SATIRICALLY, să-tĭr'rĕ-kăl-ĕ. ad. With invective, with intention to censure or vilify.

SATIRIST, săt'tŭr-ĭst. s. One who writes satires.—See PATRONESS.

To SATIRISE, săt'tŭr-īze. v. a. To censure as in a satire.

SATISFACTION, săt-tĭs-făk'shŭn. s. The act of pleasing to the full; the state of being pleased; release from suspense, uncertainty, or uneasiness; gratification, that which pleases; amends, atonement for a crime, recompense for an injury.

SATISFACTIVE, să-tĭs-făk'tĭv. a. Giving satisfaction.

SATISFACTORILY, săt-tĭs-făk'tŭr-ĕ-lĕ. ad. In a satisfactory manner.

SATISFACTORINESS, săt-tĭs-făk'tŭr-rĕ-nĕs. s. Power of satisfying, power of giving content.

SATISFACTORY, săt-tĭs-făk'tŭr-ĕ. a. Giving satisfaction, giving content; atoning, making amends.

☞ For the o, see DOMESTICK.

To SATISFY, săt'tĭs-fī. v. a. To content, to please to such a degree as that nothing more is desired; to feed to the fill; to recompense, to pay, to content; to free from doubt, perplexity, suspense; to convince.

To SATISFY, săt'tĭs-fī. v. n. To make payment.

SATRAP, sā'trăp. s. A nobleman in ancient Persia who governed a province.

SATURABLE, săt'tshŭ-rā-bl. a. Impregnable with any thing till it will receive no more.

SATURANT, săt'tshŭ-rānt. a. Impregnating to the fill.

To SATURATE, săt'tshŭ-rāte. v. a. To impregnate till no more can be received or imbibed.

SATURDAY, săt-tŭr-dē. s. (223). The last day of the week.

SATURITY, să-tū'rĕ-tē. s. Fulness, the state of being saturated, repletion.

SATURN, sā'tŭrn, or săt'tŭrn. s. The remotest planet of the solar system; in chymistry, lead.

☞ This was supposed to be the remotest planet when Dr. Johnson wrote his Dictionary; but Mr. Herschel has since discovered a planet still more remote, which will undoubtedly be called hereafter by his own name. The first pronunciation of this word is not the most general, but by far the most analogical; and for the same reason as in Satan: but there is an additional reason in this word, which will weigh greatly with the learned, and that is, the a is long in the original. Mr. Elphinston, Dr. Kenrick, Perry, and Entick, adopt the second pronunciation of this word; and Mr. Sheridan, Scott, Buchanan, W. Johnston, and, if we may guess by the position of the accent, Dr. Ash and Bailey, the first.

SATURNINE, săt'tŭr-nīne. a. (148). Gloomy, melancholy, severe of temper.

SATURNIAN, să-tū'rnē-ăn. a. Happy, golden.

SATYR, sā'tŭr, or săt'ŭr. s. A sylvan god.

☞ This word, and Satire a poem, are pronounced exactly alike, and for similar reasons.

SAVAGE, săv'vĭdje. a. (90). Wild, uncultivated; uncivilized, barbarous.

SAVAGE, săv'vĭdje. s. A man untaught and uncivilized, a barbarian.

SAVAGELY, săv'vĭdje-lĕ. ad. Barbarously, cruelly.

SAVAGENESS, săv'vĭdje-nĕs. s. Barbarousness, cruelty, wildness.

SAVAGERY, săv'vĭdje-rĕ. s. Cruelty, barbarity; wild growth.

SAVANNA, să-văn'nă. s. (92). An open meadow without wood.

SAUCE, sâwse. s. (218). Something eaten with food to improve its taste; To serve one the same sauce, a vulgar phrase to retaliate one injury with another.

To SAUCE, sâwse. v. a. To accompany meat with something of higher relish; to gratify with rich tastes; to intermix, or accompany with any thing good, or ironically, with any thing bad.

SAUCEBOX, sâwse'bŏks. s. An impertinent or petulant fellow.

SAUCEPAN, sâwse'păn. s. A small skillet with a long handle, in which sauce or small things are boiled.

SAUCER, sâw'sŭr. s. (98) (218). A small pan or platter on which sauce is set on the table; a piece or platter of china, into which a tea-cup is set.

SAUCILY, sâw'sĕ-lĕ. ad. Impudently, impertinently, petulantly.

SAUCINESS, sâw'sĕ-nĕs. s. Impudence, petulance, impertinence.

SAUCY, sâw'sĕ. a. (218). Pert, petulant, insolent.

☞ The regular sound of this diphthong must be carefully preserved, as the Italian sound of a given to it in this word, and in sauce, saucer, daughter, &c. is only heard among the vulgar.

To SAVE, sāve. v. a. To preserve from danger or destruction; to preserve finally from eternal death; not to spend, to hinder from being spent; to reserve or lay by; to spare, to excuse; to salve.

To SAVE, sāve. v. n. To be cheap.

SAVE, sāve. ad. Except, not including.

SAVEALL, sāve'ăll. s. (406). A small pan inserted into a candlestick to save the ends of candles.

SAVER, sā'vŭr. s. (98). Preserver, rescuer; one who escapes loss, though without gain; one who lays up and grows rich.

SAVIN, sāv'in. s. A plant.

SAVING, sā'vĭng. a (410). Frugal, parsimonious, not lavish; not turning to loss, though not gainful.

SAVING, sā'vĭng. ad. With exception in favour of.

SAVING, sā'vĭng. s. Escape of expense, somewhat preserved from being spent, exception in favour.

SAVINGLY, sā'vĭng-lē. ad. With parsimony.

SAVINGNESS, sā'vĭng-nĕs. s. Parsimony, frugality; tendency to promote eternal salvation.

SAVIOUR, sāve'yŭr. s. (113). Redeemer, he that has saved mankind from eternal death.

To SAUNTER, sân'tŭr, or sawn'tŭr. v. n. To wander about idly, to loiter, to linger.

☞ The first mode of pronouncing this word is the most agreeable to analogy, if not in the most general use; but where use has formed so clear a rule as in words of this form, it is wrong not to follow it. See Principles, No. 214.

Mr. Elphinston, Dr. Kenrick, Mr. Nares, and Mr. Scott, are for the first pronunciation; and Mr. Sheridan and W. Johnston for the last. Mr. Perry gives both; but by placing them as I have done, seems to give the preference to the first.

SAVORY, sā'vŭr-ē. s. A plant.

SAVOUR, sā'vŭr. s. A scent, odour; taste, power of affecting the palate.

To SAVOUR, sā'vŭr. v. n. To have any particular smell or taste; to betoken, to have an appearance or taste of something.

To SAVOUR, sā'vŭr. v. a. To like; to exhibit taste of.

SAVOURILY, sā'vŭr-ē-lē. ad. With gust, with appetite; with a pleasing relish.

SAVOURINESS, sā'vŭr-ē-nĕs. s. Taste pleasing and piquant; pleasing smell.

SAVOURY, sā'vŭr-ē. a. Pleasing to the smell; piquant to the taste.

SAVOY, sā-vŏe'. s. A sort of colewort.

SAUSAGE, sâu'sĭdje, or sâs'sĭdje. s. A roll or ball made commonly of pork or veal minced very small, with salt and spice.

☞ This word is pronounced in the first manner by correct, and in the second by vulgar speakers. Among this number, however, I do not reckon Mr. Sheridan, Mr. Smith, and Mr. Scott, who adopt it; but in my opinion, Dr. Kenrick and Mr. Perry, who prefer the first, are not only more agreeable to rule, but to the best usage. In this opinion I am confirmed by Mr. Nares, who says it is commonly pronounced in the second manner. See Principles, No. 218.

SAW, sâw. (219). The pret. of See.

SAW, sâw. s. A dentated instrument by the attrition of which wood or metal is cut; a saying, a sentence, a proverb.

To SAW, sâw. v. a. Part. Sawed and Sawn. To cut timber or other matter with a saw.

SAWFISH, sâw'fĭsh. s. A sort of fish.

SAWPIT, sâw'pĭt. s. Pit over which timber is laid to be sawn by two men.

SAW-WORT, sâw'wŭrt. s. A plant.

SAW-WREST, sâw'rĕst. s. A sort of tool. With the saw-wrest they set teeth of the saw.

SAWER, sâw'ŭr. } s. One
SAWYER, sâw'yŭr. (113). } whose trade is to saw timber into boards or beams.

SAXIFRAGE, sâk'sē-frādje. s. A plant.

SAXIFRAGOUS, sâk-sĭf'rā-gŭs. a. Dissolvent of the stone.

To SAY, sā. v. a. (220). Pret. Said. To speak, to utter in words, to tell; to tell in any manner.

SAYING, sā'ĭng. s. (410). Expression, words, opinion sententiously delivered.

SAYS, sĕz. Third person of To say.

☞ This seems to be an incorrigible deviation. (90).

SCAB, skăb. s. An incrustation formed over a sore by dried matter; the itch or mange of horses; a paltry fellow, so named from the itch.

SCABBARD, skăb'bŭrd. s. (418). The sheath of a sword.

SCABBED, skăb'bĕd, or skăb'd. a. (366). Covered or diseased with scabs; paltry, sorry.

☞ This word, like learned, blessed, and some others, when used as an adjective, is always pronounced in two syllables; and when a participle, in one. See Principles, No. 362.

SCABBEDNESS, skăb'bĕd-nĕs. s. The state of being scabbed.

SCABBINESS, skăb'bè-nĕs. s. The quality of being scabby.

SCABBY, skăb'bē. a. Diseased with scabs.

SCABIOUS, skā'bē-ŭs. a. Itchy, leprous.

SCABROUS, skā'brŭs. a. (314). Rough, rugged, pointed on the surface; harsh, unmusical.

SCABWORT, skăb'wŭrt. s. A plant.

SCAD, skăd. s. A kind of fish; probably the same as Shad.

SCAFFOLD, skăf'fŭld. s. (166). A temporary gallery or stage raised either for shows or spectators; the gallery raised for execution of great malefactors; frames of timber erected on the side of a building for the workmen.

SCAFFOLDAGE, skăl'fŭl-dĭdje. (90). Gallery, hollow floor.

SCAFFOLDING, skăf'fŭl-dĭng. s. (410). Building slightly erected.

SCALADE, skā-lāde'. } s. A storm
SCALADO, skā-lā'dō. } given to a place by raising ladders against the walls—See LUMBAGO.

SCALARY, skăl'ā-rē. a. Proceeding by steps like those of a ladder.

To SCALD, skăld. v. a. (84). To burn with hot liquor.

SCALD, skăld. s. Scurf on the head.

SCALD, skăld. a. Paltry, sorry.

SCALDHEAD, skăld-hĕd'. s. A lothsome disease, a kind of local leprosy in which the head is covered with a scab.

SCALE, skāle. s. A balance, a vessel suspended by a beam against another; the sign Libra in the Zodiack; the small shells or crusts which lying one over another make the coats of fishes; any thing exfoliated, a thin lamina; ladder, means of ascent; the act of storming by ladders; regular gradation, a regular series rising like a ladder; a figure subdivided by lines like the steps of a ladder, which is used to measure proportions between pictures and the thing represented; the series of harmonick or musical proportions; any thing marked at equal distances.

To SCALE, skāle. v. a. To climb as by ladders; to measure or compare, to weigh; to take off a thin lamina; to pare off a surface.

To SCALE, skāle. v. n. To peel off in thin particles.

SCALED, skāl'd. a. (359). Squamous, having scales like fishes.

SCALENE, skā-lēne'. s. In Geometry, a triangle that has three sides unequal to each other.

SCALINESS, skā'lē-nĕs. s. The state of being scaly.

SCALL, skāwl. s. (84). Leprosy, morbid baldness.

SCALLION, skăl'yŭn. s. (113). A kind of onion.

SCALLOP, skŏl'lŭp. s. (166). A fish with a hollow pectinated shell.

☞ This word is irregular, for it ought to have the a in the first syllable like that in tallow; but the deep sound of a is too firmly fixed by custom to afford any expectation of a change. Mr. Sheridan, Mr. Scott, Dr. Kenrick, Mr. Nares, and Mr. Smith, pronounce the a in the manner I have given it, and Mr. Perry only as in tallow.

To SCALLOP, skŏl'lŭp. v. a. To mark on the edge with segments of circles.

SCALP, skălp. s. The scull, the cranium, the bone that incloses the brain; the integuments of the head.

To SCALP, skălp. v. a. To deprive the scull of its integuments.

SCALPEL, skăl'pĕl. s. An instrument used to scrape a bone.

SCALY, skā'lē. a. Covered with scales.

To SCAMBLE, skăm'bl. v. n. (405). To be turbulent and rapacious, to scramble, to get by struggling with others; to shift awkwardly. Little used.

SCENICK, sĕn'nĭk. a. Dramatick, theatrical.

☞ From the general tendency of the antepenultimate accent to shorten the vowel, and the particular propensity to contract every vowel but i before the termination in ical, we find those in ic, which may be looked upon as abbreviations of the other, preserve the same shortening power with respect to the vowels which precede: and though the word in question might plead the long sound of the e in the Latin senicus, yet, if this plea were admitted, we ought for the same reasons to alter the sound of e in comic; nor should we know where to stop. As a plain analogy, therefore, is formed by epic, topic, tropic, tonic, &c. it would be absurd to break in upon it, under pretence of conforming to Latin quantity; as this would disturb our most settled usages, and quite unhinge the language. —See Principles, No. 544.

SCEPTICK, sĕp'tĭk. s. See SKEPTICK.

SCHEDIASM, skē'dē-ăzm. s. From the Greek σχεδιασμος, cursory writing on a loose sheet.

☞ This word is not in Johnson, but, from its utility, is certainly worthy of a niche in all our other Dictionaries as well as Ash's, where it is to be found. The Latins have their Schediasma, the French have their Feuille volante, and why should not the English have their Schediasm to express what is written in an extemporary way on a loose sheet of paper without the formality of composition?

SCHEDULE, sĕd'jûle, or skĕd'jûle. s. A small scroll; a little inventory.

☞ In the pronunciation of this word we seem to depart both from the Latin schedula and the French schedule. If we follow the first, we ought to pronounce the word skedule (353); if the last, shedule; but entirely sinking the ch in sedule seems to be the prevailing mode, and too firmly fixed by custom to be altered in favour of either of its original words. Dr. Kenrick, Mr. Perry, and Buchanan, pronounce it skedule; but Mr. Elphinston, Mr. Sheridan, Mr. Scott, Mr. Nares, Barclay, Fenning, and Shaw, sedule: though if we may believe Dr. Jones, it was pronounced skedule in Queen Anne's time.

SCHEME, skēme. s. (353). A plan, a combination of various things into one view, design, or purpose; a project, a contrivance, a design; a representation of the aspects of the celestial bodies, any lineal or mathematical diagram.

SCHEMER, skē'mûr. s. (98). A projector, a contriver.

SCHESIS, skē'sĭs. s. A habitude, the relative state of a thing, with respect to other things. A rhetorical figure in which a supposed affection or inclination of the adversary is introduced in order to be exposed.

SCHISM, sĭzm. s. A separation or division in the church.

☞ The common pronunciation of this word is contrary to every rule for pronouncing words from the learned languages, and ought to be altered. Ch in English words, coming from Greek words with χ, ought always to be pronounced like k; and I believe the word in question is almost the only exception throughout the language. However strange, therefore, skizm may sound, it is the only true and analogical pronunciation; and we might as well pronounce scheme, seme, as schism, sizm, there being exactly the same reason for both.—But when once a false pronunciation is fixed as this is, it requires some daring spirit to begin the reformation: but when once begun, as it has, what seldom happens, truth, novelty, and the appearance of Greek erudition on its side, there is no doubt of its success. Whatever, therefore, may be the fate of its pronunciation, it ought still to retain its spelling. This must be held sacred, or the whole language will be metamorphosed: for the very same reason that induced Dr. Johnson to spell Sceptick, Skeptick, ought to have made him spell schism, sizm, and schedule, sedule. All our orthoepists pronounce the word as I have marked it.

SCIOMACHY, sī-ŏm'mā-kē. s. Battle with a shadow.—See MONOMACHY.

☞ Mr. Nares questions whether the c should not be pronounced hard in this word, (or as it ought rather to be schiamachy,) and if so, he says, ought we not to write skiamachy, for the same reason as skeptick? I answer, exactly.—See SCIRRHUS and SKEPTICK.

SCION, sī'ŭn. s. (166). A small twig taken from one tree to be engrafted into another.

SCIRE FACIAS, sī-rē-fā'shās. s. A writ judicial in law.

SCIRRHUS, skĭr'rŭs. s. (109). An indurated gland.

☞ This word is sometimes, but improperly, written schirrus, with the h in the first syllable instead of the last; and Bailey and Fenning have given us two aspirations, and spelt it schirrhus; both of which modes of spelling the word are contrary to the general analogy of orthography; for as the word comes from the Greek σκίῤῥος, the latter r only can have the aspiration, as the first of these double letters has always the spiritus lenis: and the c in the first syllable, arising from the Greek κ, and not the χ, no more reason can be given for placing the h after it, by spelling it schirrus, than there is for spelling scene for σκηνη, schene; or sceptre from σκηπτρον, schep-tre. The most correct Latin orthography confirms this opinion, by spelling the word in question scirrhus; and, according to the most settled analogy of our own language, and the constant method of pronouncing words from the Greek and Latin, the c ought to be soft before the i in this word, and the first syllable should be pronounced like the first of syr-inge, Sir-ius, &c.

Whatever might have been the occasion of the false orthography of this word, its false pronunciation seems fixed beyond recovery: and Dr. Johnson tells us it ought to be written skirrhus, not merely because it comes from σκιῤῥος, but because c in English has before e and i the sound of s. Dr. Johnson is the last man that I should have suspected of giving this advice. What! because a false orthography has obtained, and a false pronunciation in consequence of it, must both these errours be confirmed by a still grosser departure from analogy? A little reflection on the consequences of so pernicious a practice would, I doubt not, have made Dr. Johnson retract his advice. While a true orthography remains, there is some hope that a false pronunciation may be reclaimed; but when once the orthography is altered pronunciation is incorrigible; and we must bow to the tyrant, however false may be his title.—See Principles, No. 350, and the word SKEPTICK.

Mr. Sheridan pronounces this word skirrous. Mr. Scott, Mr. Perry, and W. Johnston have omitted it; neither Dr. Kenrick, nor Buchanan, take any notice of the sound of c, and, according to them, it might be pronounced s; but Barclay writes it to be pronounced skirrus.

SEPULCHRE, sĕp'pŭl-kŭr. s. (416) (177). A grave, a tomb.

☞ I consider this word as having altered its original accent on the second syllable, either by the necessity or caprice of the poets, or by its similitude to the generality of words of this form and number of syllables (503), which generally have the accent on the first syllable. Dr. Johnson tells us it is accented by Shakespeare and Milton on the second syllable, but by Jonson and Prior more properly on the first; and he might have added, as Shakespeare has sometimes done:

"Ah me! this sight of death is as a bell
"That warns my old age to its sepulchre."
Shakespeare.

"Go to thy lady's grave and call her thence;
"Or at the least in hers, sepulchre thine."
Shakespeare.

"I am glad to see that time survive,
"Where merit is not sepulchred alive."
Ben Jonson.

"Thou so sepulchred in such pomp dost lie,
"That kings for such a tomb would wish to die."
Milton.

To accent this word on the second syllable, as Shakespeare and Milton have done, is agreeable to a very general rule, that when we introduce into our own language a word from the Greek or Latin, and either preserve it entire, or the same number of syllables; in this case we preserve the accent on the same syllable as in the original word. This rule has some exceptions, as may be seen in the Principles, No. 503, (e,) but has still a very great extent. Now sepulchrum, from which this word is derived, has the accent on the second syllable; and sepulchre ought to have it on the same; while sepulture, on the contrary, being formed from sepultura, by dropping a syllable, the accent removes to the first (see ACADEMY). As a confirmation that the current pronunciation of Sepulchre was with the accent on the second syllable, every old inhabitant of London can recollect always having heard the Church called by that name so pronounced; but the antepenultimate accent seems now so fixed as to make an alteration hopeless. Mr. Forster, in his Essay on Accent and Quantity, says that this is the common pronunciation of the present day; and Dr. Johnson, Mr. Elphinston, Mr. Sheridan, Mr. Scott, Dr. Kenrick, Dr. Ash, Mr. Perry, Barclay, Entick, and W. Johnston, place the accent on the first syllable both of this word and sepulture. Fenning places the accent on the second syllable of Sepulchre when a noun, and on the first when a verb. Mr. Sheridan very properly reverses this order: W. Johnston places the accent on the second syllable of Sepulture; and Bailey on the second of both. All our orthoëpists place the accent on the second syllable of sepulchral, except Dr. Ash and Barclay, who place it upon the same syllable as in Sepulchre; and the uncouth pronunciation this accentuation produces, is a fresh proof of the impropriety of the common accent (493).

☞ The corrupt pronunciation of this word is become universal, though in Junius's time it should seem to have been confined to London; for, under the word Shore, he says, "Common Shore, Londinensibus ita "corrupte dicitur, the common sewer."—Johnson has given us no etymology of this word; but Skinner tells us, "Non infeliciter Cowellus declinat á verb. Issue, dic- "tumque putat quasi Issuer abjecta initiali "syllaba." Nothing can be more natural than this derivation; the s going into sh before u, preceded by the accent, is agreeable to analogy (452); and the u in this case being pronounced like ew, might easily draw the word into the common orthography, sewer; while the sound of sh was preserved, and the ew as in shew, strew, and sew, might soon slide into o, and thus produce the present anomaly.

Perry, and Barclay, are for the irregular sound; W. Johnston gives both, but places the irregular first: and the Grammar called Bickerstaff's, recommended by Steele, adopts the sound, and gives this rule:

"To sound like double (e) (i) does incline;
"As in Machine and Shire, and Magazine:
"Like (a) in Sirrah; but writ (oi) in join."

It may likewise be observed, that this word, when unaccented at the end of words, as Nottinghamshire, Wiltshire, &c. is always pronounced with the i like ee.

SHORELESS, shôre'lês. a. Having no coast.

SHORN, shôrne. The part. pass. of Shear.

☞ This word was inadvertently marked with the third sound of o in the first edition of this Dictionary; but from considering its analogy with swear, wear, and tear, I do not hesitate to alter it to the first sound of that vowel; Mr. Sheridan, Mr. Smith, and W. Johnston, are for the first pronunciation; but Mr. Perry, Mr. Nares, and Mr. Elphinston, are for the last; and these authorities, with analogy on their side, are decisive.

SHORT, shôrt. a. (167). Not long, commonly not long enough; repeated by quick iterations; not reaching the purposed point, not adequate; not far distant in time; defective; scanty; not going so far as was intended; narrow, contracted; brittle.

SHRIEK, shrēēk. s. An inarticulate cry of anguish or horrour.

SHRIEVE, shrēēv. s. (275). A sheriff.

☞ This was the ancient mode of writing and pronouncing this word. Stow, indeed, writes it shrive; but it is highly probable that the i had exactly the sound of ie in grieve, thieve, &c. and the common people of London to this day have preserved this old pronunciation, though it is wearing away fast among them. That this is the true etymological manner of writing and pronouncing it, we need but attend to the Saxon word from which it is derived, to be convinced, Reve, or Reeve, signifies a steward; and Shrieve is but a contraction of Shire Reeve or Shire Steward. But however just this orthography and pronunciation may be in other respects, it wants the true stamp of polite usage to make it current; it is now grown old and vulgar, and Pope's use of this word,

"Now Mayors and Shrieves all hush'd and satiate lay,"— must only be looked upon as assisting the humour of the scene he describes.

SHRIEVALTY, shrēē'vāl-tē. s. The office of a sheriff.

☞ By a caprice common in language, this compound is not nearly so antiquated as its simple; though it should seem, that if the old root be taken away, and another planted in its stead, the branches ought to spring from the latter, and not the former. —But though we seldom hear Shrieve for Sheriff, except among the lower classes of people in London, we not unfrequently hear, even among the better sort, Shrievalty for Sheriffalty; and Junius, in one of his letters to the Duke of Grafton, says, "Your next appearance in office is marked "with his election to the Shrievalty." Public Advertiser, July 9, 1771. This is certainly an inaccuracy; and such an inaccuracy, in such a writer as Junius, is not a little surprising.

☞ A very extraordinary pronunciation of this word prevails in London, and what is more extraordinary, on the Stage, so different from every other word of the same form as to make it a perfect oddity in the language. This pronunciation approaches to the word scythe; and the only difference is, that scythe has the flat aspiration as in this; and sigh the sharp one, as in thin. It is not easy to conjecture what could be the reason of this departure from analogy, unless it were to give the word a sound which seems an echo to the sense; and if this intention had gone no farther than the lengthening or shortening of a vowel, it might have been admitted, as in fearful, cheerful, pierce, fierce, great, leisure, and some others; but pronouncing gh like th in this word is too palpable a contempt of orthography to pass current without the stamp of the best, the most universal and permanent usage on its side. The Saxon combination gh, according to the general rule, both in the middle and at the end of a word, is silent. It had anciently a guttural pronunciation, which is still retained in great part of Scotland, and in some of the northern parts of England: but every guttural sound has been long since banished from the language; not, however, without some efforts to continue, by changing these letters, sometimes into the related guttural consonant k, as in lough, hough, &c. and sometimes into a consonant entirely unrelated to them, as in laugh, cough, &c. These are the only transmutations of these letters; and these established irregularities are quite sufficient without admitting such as are only candidates for confusion. If it be pleaded that sithe better expresses the emission of breath in the act of sighing, it may be answered, that nothing can be more erroneous, as the tongue and teeth have nothing to do in this action. Mr. Sheridan has, indeed, to assist this expression, spelled the word sih, as an aspiration must necessarily accompany the act of sighing; but (to take no notice that, in this case, the h ought to be before the i) (397), though such expression may be very proper in oratory, when accompanied by passion, it would be as affected to give it this aspiration in ordinary speech, as to pronounce the word fearful with a tremour of the voice and a faltering of the tongue, or to utter the word laugh with a convulsive motion of the breast and lungs. To these reasons may be added the laws of rhyme; which necessarily exclude this affected pronunciation, and oblige us to give the word its true analogical sound:

"Love is a smoke, rais'd with the fume of sighs;
"Being purg'd, a fire, sparkling in lovers' eyes."

☞ This word, though uniformly accented on the second syllable by the poets quoted by Johnson, is as uniformly accented on the first by all our lexicographers, and is uniformly so pronounced by the best speakers. Mr. Nares tells us, that Dr. Johnson seems to think, that when this word is used in its literal sense, as

"In his sinister hand, instead of ball,
He plac'd a mighty mug of potent ale."
Dryden.

it has the accent on the second syllable; but when in the figurative sense of corrupt, insidious, &c. on the first. This distinction seems not to be founded on the best usage, and is liable to the objections noticed under the word BOWL.—See Principles, No. 495.

SINISTROUS, sĭn'nĭs-trŭs. a. Absurd, perverse, wrong-headed.

SINISTROUSLY, sĭn'nĭs-trŭs-lē. ad. With a tendency to the left; perversely, absurdly. Accented according to the adjective.

SIRIUS, sĭr'rė-ŭs. s. The dogstar.

SIROCCO, sė-rŏk'kō. s. The south-east or Syrian wind.

SIRRAH, sĭr'rā. s. A compellation of reproach and insult.

☞ This is a corruption of the first magnitude, but too general and inveterate to be remedied. Mr. Sheridan, Mr. Nares, Mr. Scott, Dr. Kenrick, and Mr. Perry, pronounce it as I have done. W. Johnston alone pronounces it as if written serrah; and Mr. Elphinston, because it is derived from Sir and the interjection ah. says it ought to have the first syllable like Sir. See quotation under the word Shire.

SIROP, or SIRUP, sŭr'rŭp. s. (166). The juice of vegetables boiled with sugar.

☞ The i in this word and its compounds is irrecoverably corrupted into short u.

SKEPTICK, skĕp'tĭk. s. (350). One who doubts, or pretends to doubt of every thing.—See SCIRRHUS.

☞ It is with some reluctance I have given this word, as Dr. Johnson has written it, a place in this Dictionary; not because it is not generally pronounced in this manner, but that I think conforming our spelling to a prevailing pronunciation, when this pronunciation is contrary to analogy, is pregnant with the greatest evils that can happen to a language. While the original landmark is standing, the true proprietor may claim his rights; but when once that is effaced, there is no hope of a resumption. How Dr. Johnson could remove this landmark is astonishing. It is one of those unaccountable absurdities that sometimes enter into the characters of men, whose understandings are as much above the rest of the world in some things, as they are below them in others. The truth is, this great man troubled himself little about pronunciation, he seems to have cared as little for etymologies; and even grammatical disquisitions seem not to have been his favourite study; but when words were to be precisely defined, when the boundaries of their significations were to be fixed, and their most delicate shades of meaning to be distinguished and exemplified, this task, so difficult to the strongest mind, seemed to present him with an operation worthy of his powers; in this labour he was, indeed, a literary Hercules, and in this he has toiled with honour to himself, and to the essential improvement of the English language.

SKEPTICAL, skĕp'tĕ-kăl. a. Doubtful, pretending to universal doubt.

SKEPTICISM, skĕp'tĕ-sĭzm. s. Universal doubt, pretence or profession of universal doubt.

Slain, slāne. The part. pass. of Slay.

To Slake, slāke. v. a. To quench, to extinguish.

☞ There is a corrupt pronunciation of this word like the word slack. This is the word, as Dr. Johnson observes, from which it is evidently derived; but as it has acquired a distinct and appropriated meaning, it is with great propriety that it differs a little from its original, both in orthography and pronunciation.

All our orthoepists unite in pronouncing this word regularly; but, as Mr. Smith observes, bricklayers and their labourers universally pronounce it with the short a, as if written slack; and it may be added, that the correctest speakers, when using the participial adjective in the words unslacked lime, pronounce the a in the same manner; but this ought to be avoided.

To SOJOURN, sō'jŭrn. v. n. (314). To dwell any where for a time, to live as not at home, to inhabit as not in a settled habitation.

☞ This verb and noun, as may be seen in Johnson, are variously accented by the poets; but our modern orthöepists have in general given the accent to the first syllable of both words. Dr. Kenrick, Perry, Entick, and Buchanan, accent the second syllable; but Dr. Johnson, Mr. Sheridan, Dr. Ash, Mr. Nares, W. Johnston, Bailey, Barclay and Fenning, the first. Mr. Scott gives both accents, but that on the first syllable the first place.

SOJOURN, sŏ'jŭrn. s. A temporary residence, a casual and no settled habitation.

SOLDAN, sŏl'dăn. s. The emperor of the Turks.

To SOLDER, sŏl'dŭr. v. a. To unite or fasten with any kind of metallick cement; to mend, to unite any thing broken.

☞ Dr. Johnson seems to favour writing this word without the l, as it is sometimes pronounced: but the many examples he has brought where it is spelled with l, show sufficiently how much this orthography is established. It is highly probable, that omitting the sound of l in this word began with mechanicks; and as the word has been lately little used, except in mechanical operations, this pronunciation has crept into our Dictionaries, but ought not to be extended to the liberal and metaphorical use of the word. It is derived from the Latin solidare, the Italian soldare, or the French souder: and when other things are equal, Dr. Johnson's rule of deriving words rather from the French than the Latin, is certainly a good one, but ought not to overturn a settled orthography, which has a more original language than the French in its favour. Though our orthöepists agree in leaving out the l, they differ in pronouncing the o. Sheridan sounds the o as in sod; W. Johnston as in sober; and Mr. Nares as the diphthong aw. Mr. Smith says, that Mr. Walker pronounces the l in this word, but every workman pronounces it as rhyming with fodder: to which it may be answered, that workmen ought to take their pronunciation from scholars, and not scholars from workmen.—See CLEFF.

SOLDER, sŏl'dŭr. s. Metallick cement.

SOLDERER, sŏl'dŭr-ŭr. s. One that solders or amends.

SOLDIER, sōl'jŭr. s. (295) (376). A fighting man, a warriour; it is generally used of the common men, as distinct from the commanders.

☞ No orthöepist, except W. Johnston, leaves out the l in this word; but I have frequently had occasion to differ from this gentleman, and in this I do devoutly.

☞ Notwithstanding I have Mr. Sheridan, Mr. Nares, Dr. Kenrick, W. Johnston, Mr. Perry, and the professors of the Black Art themselves, against me in the pronunciation of this word, I have ventured to prefer the regular pronunciation to the irregular. The adjective sooty has its regular sound among the correctest speakers, which has induced Mr. Sheridan to mark it so; but nothing can be more absurd than to pronounce the substantive in one manner and the adjective derived from it by adding y in another. The other orthoëpists, therefore, who pronounce both these words with the oo like u, are more consistent than Mr. Sheridan, though, upon the whole, not so right.

To Sour, sŏur. v. n. To become acid; to grow peevish or crabbed.

Source, sôrse. s. (318). Spring, fountain-head; original, first producer.

☞ Some respectable speakers have attempted to give the French sound to the diphthong in this word and its compound resource, as if written soorce and resoorce; but as this is contrary to analogy, so it is to general usage. Sheridan, Nares, Smith, and W. Johnston, give the same sound to both these words as I have done. Mr. Perry gives the same sound to source, and, as well as I can guess from the blindness of the print, to resource also. Mr. Scott gives both sounds, but seems to prefer the first; Kenrick only gives source the sound of soorce; and the diphthong ou in resource, the same sound as in hour, town, &c.

☞ I have differed from Mr. Sheridan in the quantity of the i in the first syllable of this word, because I think the same antepenultimate accent which shortens the o in oracle, and the i in miracle, ought to have the same influence in the word in question (503).

SPIRAL, spi'rål. a. (88). Curve, winding, circularly involved.

SPIRALLY, spi'rål-ē. ad. In a spiral form.

SPIRE, spire. s. A curve line, any thing wreathed or contorted, a curl, a twist, a wreath; any thing growing up taper, a round pyramid, a steeple; the top or uppermost point.

To SPIRE, spire. v. n. To shoot up pyramidically.

SPIRIT, spir'ĭt. s. (109). Breath, wind in motion; an immaterial substance; the soul of man; an apparition; ardour, courage; genius, vigour of mind; intellectual powers distinct from the body; sentiment; eagerness, desire; man of activity, man of life; that which gives vigour or cheerfulness to the mind; any thing eminently pure and refined; that which hath power of energy; an inflammable liquor raised by distillation.

☞ The general sound of the first i in this word and all its compounds was, till lately, the sound of e in merit: but a very laudable attention to propriety has nearly restored the i to its true sound; and now spirit, sounded as if written sperit, begins to grow vulgar See Principles, No 103, 109, 110, and the word MIRACLE.

Mr. Sheridan, W. Johnston, and Mr. Smith, have given into this false sound of i (109); but Dr. Kenrick, Mr. Scott, and Mr. Perry, have given it the true sound; and Mr. Nares very justly thinks that this word, Miracle, and Cistern, are now more frequently and properly heard with the short sound of i.

To SPIRIT, spir'ĭt. v. a. To animate or actuate as a spirit; to excite, to animate, to encourage; to draw, to entice.

SPIRITED, spir'ĭt-ĕd. a. Lively, full of fire.

SPIRITEDNESS, spir'ĭt-ĕd-nĕs. s. Disposition or make of mind.

SPIRITFULNESS, spir'ĭt-fŭl-nĕs. s. Sprightliness, liveliness.

SPITEFULNESS, spīte'fŭl-nĕs. s. Malignity, desire of vexing.

SPITTAL, spĭt'tăl. s. Corrupted from Hospital, and seldom used but to a sermon preached at an hospital, as a spittal sermon; or in the proverbial phrase, Rob not the spital; or in the name of that district of London called Spitalfields.

☞ The a in all these words has a tendency to sink its sound, and to confound them with spittle. In the last of these words this tendency is incurable; but in the two first it would be far from pedantic to preserve the sound of the a as in medal. Dr. Johnson seems to depart from etymology in doubling the t in these words.

SPITTED, spĭt'tĕd. a. Shot out into length, put on a spit.

SPITTER, spĭt'tŭr. s. (98). One who puts meat on a spit; one who spits with his mouth; a young deer.

sue from a fountain; to proceed as from a source; to shoot, to issue with speed and violence.

To SPRING, spring. v. a. (409). To start, to rouse game; to produce to light; to cause by starting a plank; to discharge a mine; to contrive a sudden expedient, to offer unexpectedly; to produce hastily.

SPRING, spring. s. The season in which plants spring and vegetate; an elastick body, a body which when distorted has the power of restoring itself; elastick force; any active power, any cause by which motion is produced or propagated; a leap, a bound, a jump, a violent effort, a sudden struggle; a fountain, an issue of water from the earth; a source, that by which any thing is supplied; rise, beginning; course, original.

SPRINGE, sprinje. s. Rhymes, fringe. A gin, a noose which catches by a spring or jerk.

SPRINGER, spring'ŭr. s. (98). One who springs or rouses game.

☞ The g ought here to rest in the nasal sound, and not to be suffered to articulate the e as it does in finger. See Principles, No. 381 and 409.

SPRINGHALT, spring'hâlt. s. A lameness by which the horse twitches up his legs.

SPRINGINESS, spring'ė-nĕs, or sprin'jė-nĕs. s. Elasticity, power of restoring itself.—See SPRINGY.

SPRINGLE, spring'gl. s. (405). A springe, an elastick noose.

SPRINGTIDE, spring'tide. s. Tide at the new moon, high tide.

SPRINGY, spring'ė, or sprin'jė. a. Elastick, having the power of restoring itself.

☞ A most absurd custom has prevailed in pronouncing this adjective, as if it were formed from springe, a gin, rhyming with fringe, when nothing can be plainer than its formation from spring, an elastic body, and that the addition of y ought no more to alter the sound of g in this word, than it does in stringy, full of strings. It is certainly thus we ought to pronounce the substantive formed from this adjective, which we meet with in Mr. Forster: "In general, that nervous springiness (If I may so express it) so very observable in Mr. Pope's metre, is often owing chiefly to a Trochee beginning his line." Essay on Accent and Quantity. p. 59.—But the absurdity is still increased when this vicious pronunciation is given to the adjective formed from spring, a fountain; this, however, is so contrary both to custom and analogy, that nothing but an oversight in Mr. Sheridan could have prevented his making the distinction. See Principles, No. 409.

SPRINGY, spring'ė. a. (409). Full of springs or fountains.

To SPRINKLE, spring'kl. v. a. (405). To scatter, to disperse in small masses; to scatter in drops; to besprinkle, to wash, to wet, or dust by sprinkling.

STATIST, stā'tĭst. s. A statesman, a politician. Not in use.

STATISTICAL, stă-tĭs'tĕ-kăl. } a.
STATISTICK, stă-tĭs'tĭk. }

☞ This word is not found in any of our Dictionaries, and seems to have been first used by Sir John Sinclair in his plan for a statement of the trade, population, and productions of every county in Scotland; with the food, diseases, and longevity of its inhabitants. A plan which reflects the greatest credit on the understanding and benevolence of that gentleman, as it is big with advantages both to the philosopher and the politician. These words must not be confounded with Statical and Statick; for though such a plan leads to a philosophical weighing of these provincial circumstances, yet certainly the first idea is that of stating these circumstances; and therefore these words are formed from the English verb to state, and not from statics, derived from the Greek word στατικη.

SUBJECTED, sŭb-jĕk'tĕd. part. adject. Put under, reduced to submission, exposed, made liable to.

☞ A very improper, though a very prevailing misaccentuation of the passive participle of the word to subject, has obtained, which ought to be corrected. All the authorities in Johnson place the accent of subjected on the same syllable as the verb, except one from Milton:

"He subjected to man's service angel wings."

But in another passage Milton accents this word as it ought to be, even when an adjective:

"——————The angel
"Led them direct and down the cliff as fast
"To the subjected plain."

But as the word subject is an adjective as well as a verb, and when an adjective it has always the accent on the first syllable, so the participle has not only caught the accent of the adjective, but, as one errour commonly generates another, seems to have communicated the impropriety to the verb; which we sometimes hear, contrary to all analogy and authority, accented on the first syllable likewise. These improprieties are easily corrected at first, and they are not yet so rooted as to make correctness look like pedantry.

SUBJECT, sŭb'jĕkt. a. Placed or situated under; living under the dominion of another; exposed, liable, obnoxious; being that on which any action operates.

SUBJECT, sŭb'jĕkt. s. (492). One who lives under the dominion of another; that on which any operation either mental or material is performed; that in which any thing inheres or exists; in Grammar, the nominative case to a verb, is called, by grammarians, the Subject of the verb.

act of sinking, tendency downward.

SUBSIDIARY, sŭb-sĭd'ē-â-rē, or sŭb-sĭd'jē-â-rē. a. (293) (294) (376). Assistant, brought in aid.

To SUBSIDIZE, sŭb'sē-dīze. v. a. To give money to receive aid or assistance.

☞ This word seems to have grown out of the last war; if so, it is a little surprising that an action so common before should not have generated a word to express it.

SUBSIDY, sŭb'sē-dē. s. Aid, commonly such as is given in money.

To SUBSIGN, sŭb-sīne'. v. a. To sign under.

To SUBSIST, sŭb-sĭst'. v. n. To continue, to retain the present state or condition; to have means of living, to be maintained; to adhere, to have existence.

To SUBSTRACT, sŭb-străkt'. v. a. To take away part from the whole; to take one number from another.—See To SUBTRACT.

SUBSTRACTION, sŭb-străk'shŭn. s. The act of taking part from the whole; the taking of a lesser number out of a greater of like kind, whereby to find out a third number or difference

SUBSTRUCTION, sŭb-strŭk'shŭn. s. Underbuilding.

SUBSTYLAR, sŭb-stī'lăr. a. Substylar line is, in Dialling, a right line, whereon the gnomon or style of a dial is erected at right angles with the plane.

SUBSULTIVE, sŭb-sŭl'tĭv. } a.
SUBSULTORY, sŭb'sŭl-tŭr-ē. }
Bounding, moving by starts.

☞ Mr. Sheridan is the only orthoëpist who has accented this word on the first syllable, as I have done; for Dr. Johnson, Dr. Ash, Dr. Kenrick, Barclay, Fenning, Bailey, and Entick, accent the second. Its companion, Desultory, is accented on the first syllable by Mr. Sheridan, Dr. Johnson, Mr. Nares, Mr. Smith, and Fenning; but on the second by Dr. Ash, Dr. Kenrick, Mr. Scott, W. Johnston, Mr. Perry, Buchanan, Bailey, and Entick. As these two words must necessarily be accented alike, we see Dr. Johnson and Fenning are inconsistent. But though the majority of authorities are against me in both these words, I greatly mistake if analogy is not clearly on my side. See Principles, No. 512.

SUBSULTORILY, sŭb'sŭl-tŭr-ē-lē. ad. In a bounding manner.

SUBTANGENT, sŭb-tăn'jĕnt. s. In any curve, is the line which determines the intersection of the tangent in the axis prolonged.

SUBTILIZATION, sŭb-tĭl-ē-zā'shŭn. s. Subtilization is making any thing so volatile as to rise readily in steam or vapour; refinement, superfluous acuteness.

To SUBTILIZE, sŭb'tĭl-īze. v. a. To make thin, to make less gross or coarse: to refine, to spin into useless niceties.

SUBTLE, sŭt'tl. a. (347) (405). Sly, artful, cunning.

SUBTLETY, sŭt'tl-tē. s. Artfulness, cunning.

SUBTLY, sŭt'lē. ad. Sly, artfully, cunningly: nicely, delicately.

To SUBTRACT, sŭb-trăkt'. v. a. See SUBSTRACT.

☞ This orthography seems to prevail over substract. The vanity of deriving words from the Latin rather than a living language is very prevalent; but the s in this word intervening between the two mutes certainly makes the word flow more easily, and the alteration is therefore to be regretted.

SUCCESSLESS, sŭk-sĕs'lĕs. a. Unlucky, unfortunate, failing of the event desired.

SUCCESSOR, sŭk'sĕs-sŭr, or sŭk-sĕs'ŭr. s. (503). One that follows in the place or character of another, correlative to Predecessor.

☞ This word is not unfrequently pronounced with the accent on the second syllable, as if it were formed from success; but this accentuation, though agreeable to its Latin original, has, as in Confessor, yielded to the prevailing power of the English antepenultimate accent.

Dr. Johnson, Mr. Sheridan, Mr. Elphinston, and Entick, accent this word on the first syllable; and Dr. Ash, Dr. Kenrick, W. Johnston, Mr. Perry, Buchanan, and Bailey, on the second; Barclay and Fenning give both, but prefer the first: Mr. Scott gives both, and prefers the second: but, from the opinion that is foolishly gone forth, that we ought to accent words as near the beginning as possible, there is little doubt that the antepenultimate accent will prevail.

SUCCINCT, sŭk-sĭngkt'. a. (408). Tucked or girded up, having the clothes drawn up; short, concise, brief.

To SUGGEST, sŭg-jĕst'. v. a. To hint, to intimate, to insinuate good or ill; to seduce, to draw to ill by insinuation; to inform secretly.

☞ Though the first g in Exaggerate is, by a carelessness of pronunciation, assimilated to the last, this is not always the case in the present word. For though we sometimes hear it sounded as if written sud-jest, the most correct speakers generally preserve the first and last g in their distinct and separate sounds.

Mr. Sheridan, Mr. Scott, and Mr. Nares, pronounce the g in both syllables soft, as if written sud-jest. Dr. Kenrick, Mr. Perry, and Barclay, make the first g hard, and the second soft, as if written sug-jest, as I have done; for as the accent is not on these consonants, there is not the same apology for pronouncing the first soft as there is in exaggerate; which see.

SUITRESS, sū'trĕs. s. A female supplicant.

SULCATED, sŭl'kā-tĕd. a. Furrowed.

SULKY, sŭl'kē. a. Silently sullen, sour, morose, obstinate.

☞ This word has long been a vagabond in conversation, and was not to be found in any of our Dictionaries till it was lately admitted to a place in Entick's, and, from its very frequent use, may now be considered as a denizen of the language. Mr. Colman had, many years ago, made use of it in his prologue to "The Wife in the Right," where he says——

"No sulky critick to the Playhouse drawn,
"Whom modern comedy provokes to yawn."

And this writer's authority alone is a sufficient proof of the propriety and utility of the word. It may perhaps be objected, that the word sullen is perfectly equivalent, and renders this word useless. Those, however, who consider language philosophically, know that there are no words perfectly synonimous, and consequently that there are no useless words. If it be asked what is the difference between these words, I would answer, that sullenness seems to be an habitual sulkiness, and sulkiness a temporary sullenness. The former may be an innate disposition; the latter, a disposition occasioned by recent injury. The one has a malignancy in it threatening danger; the other, an obstinate averseness to pleasure. Thus we are in a sullen mood, and in a sulky fit; Men and Women are said to be sullen, and Children sulky; sullenness may be predicated of inanimate objects, sulkiness only of such as are animated.

"No cheerful breeze this sullen region knows;
"The dreadful East is all the wind that
"blows." Pope.

If these distinctions are just, there is good reason for receiving the word in question and incorporating it into the language, even though it had not been adopted by the respectable writer I have quoted.

SUPERABLE, sū'pĕr-ă-bl. a. (405). Conquerable, such as may be overcome.

☞ There is a corrupt pronunciation of this word, arising from want of attention to the influence of accent on the sounds of the letters, which makes the first syllable of this word sound like the noun shoe.——This pronunciation Mr. Sheridan has adopted, not only in this word, but in all those which commence with the inseparable preposition super. That this is contrary to the most established rules of orthoepy, may be seen in Principles, No. 454 and 462; and that it is contrary to Mr. Sheridan himself, may be seen by his giving the s in the words insuperable, insuperableness, insuperably, and insuperability, its simple sound only.——See INSUPERABLE.

To SURVEY, sûr-vâ'. v. a. To overlook, to have under the view; to oversee as one in authority; to view as examining.

SURVEY, sûr-vâ', or sûr'vâ. s. View, prospect.

☞ This substantive was, till within these few years, universally pronounced with the accent on the last syllable, like the verb: but since Johnson and Lowth led the way, a very laudable desire of regulating and improving our language has given the substantive the accent on the first syllable, according to a very general rule in the language (492); but this has produced an anomaly in pronunciation, for which, in my opinion, the accentual distinction of the noun and verb does not make amends: if we place the accent on the first syllable of the noun, the ey in the last must necessarily be pronounced like ey in barley, attorney, journey, &c. Notwithstanding therefore this accentuation has numbers to support it, I think it but a short-sighted emendation, and not worth adopting. All our orthöepists pronounce the verb with the accent on the last, except Fenning, who accents the first. Mr. Sheridan, Mr. Scott, Mr. Nares, Dr. Ash, Perry, and Entick, accent the first syllable of the noun; but Dr. Johnson and Bailey, the original lexicographers, accent the last. Dr. Kenrick does not accent the noun, and Barclay has not inserted it.

SURVEYOR, sûr-vâ'ûr. s. (166). An overseer, one placed to superintend others; a measurer of land.

SURVEYORSHIP, sûr-vâ'ûr-shîp. s. The office of a surveyor.

To SURVIVE, sûr-vîve'. v. n. To live after the death of another; to remain alive.

SUSCEPTIBLE, sûs-sêp'tê-bl. a. Capable of admitting. See INCOMPARABLE.

☞ Dr. Johnson says, Prior has accented this word improperly on the first syllable. To which observation Mr. Mason adds, "Perhaps it is Johnson who has improperly placed the accent on the second syl-

"lable." If Mr. Mason were asked why? perhaps he would be puzzled to answer. If it be said that usage is on the side of Prior, what shall we think of all our orthöepists who have accented this word like Johnson? for thus we find the word accented by Sheridan, Kenrick, Scott, Perry, W. Johnston, Buchanan, and Barclay. Entick has, indeed, the accent on the first, but on the second of susceptive; and why? it may be asked; if usage alone is pleaded, it may be answered, What can be a better proof of usage than the authors I have quoted? But Mr. Nares, with his usual good sense, reprobates this accentuation on the first syllable, and says it is high time to oppose it. The only argument that can be alledged for it, is that which Mr. Elphinston has brought in favour of comparable, admirable, and acceptable, which is, that when the accent is on the second syllable of these words, they signify only a physical possibility of being compared, admired, and accepted; but when the accent is on the first, they signify a fitness or worthiness of being compared, admired, and accepted. "Thus," says he, "one "thing is literally compárable with ano- "ther, if it can be compared with it, "though not perhaps cómparable, that is "fit to be compared to it; so a thing may "be accéptable by a man, that is far from "being acceptable to him."—Principles of the English Language, vol. i. page 169.

This is the best reason I ever yet heard for this high accentuation; but how such a difference of pronunciation tends to perplex and obscure the meaning, may be seen under the word Bowl; nor does the word in question seem susceptible of such a difference in the sense from a different accentuation. When Poets are on the rack for a word of a certain length and a certain accent, it is charity to make allowances for their necessities; but no quarter should be given to coxcombs in prose, who have no better plea for a novelty of pronunciation, than a fop has for being the first in the fashion, however ridiculous and absurd.

☞ This word has been in very general use for near twenty years, and has not yet found its way into any of our Dictionaries.

From the recent introduction of this word, one should be led to believe, that England was, till lately a stranger to this species of fraud; but that it should be imported to that country by so honest a people as the Germans, is still more surprising. That a language is a map of the science and manners of the people who speak it will scarcely be questioned by those who consider the origin and progress of the human understanding; and if so, it is impossible that the manners should not influence the language, and that the language should not correspond to the manners. From this reasoning therefore we may conclude, that the faith of trafick was more sacred in England than in Germany, though Germany might in other respects be less vicious than England.

To Swoon, swōōn. v. n. (475). To suffer a suspension of thought and sensation, to faint.

This word should be carefully distinguished in the pronunciation from soon: the w, as Mr. Nares justly observes, is effective, and should be heard. It would have been beneath a Dictionary of the least credit to take notice of a vulgar pronunciation of this word as if written sound, if it had not been adopted by one of our orthoëpists. The same observation holds good of the following word, which must not be pronounced exactly like soop.

Swoon, swōōn. s. A lipothymy, a fainting fit.

To Swoop, swōōp. v. a. (306). To fall at once as a hawk upon its prey; to prey upon, to catch up.

Swoop, swōōp. s. Fall of a bird of prey upon his quarry.

Swordknot, sōrd'nŏt. s. Ribband tied to the hilt of a sword.

Swordlaw, sōrd'lâw. s. Violence.

Swordman, sōrd'mân. s. Soldier, fighting man.

I see no good reason why we should not write and pronounce swordsman and gownsman rather than swordman and gownman, though Johnson produces his authorities for the latter orthography from good authors. The s seems to have intervened naturally between the mute and the liquid to facilitate the pronunciation, as in statesman, sportsman, bucksman, and sometimes between the two liquids, as townsman, salesman, &c. But Dr. Johnson's sense of the word swordman, meaning a man of the profession of the sword, is now obsolete: we now never hear the word but as signifying a man expert in the use of the sword; and in this sense it is always called a swordsman.

Swordplayer, sōrd'plâ-ŭr. s. Gladiator, fencer.

SYNOD, sĭn'nŏd. s. (166). An assembly, particularly of ecclesiasticks; conjunction of the heavenly bodies.

☞ A plain English speaker would always pronounce the y in this word long; nor is it pronounced short by the more informed speaker, because the y is short in Synod, but because we always pronounce it so in the Latin word. See Principles, No. 544.

SYNODAL, sĭn'nō-dăl.

SYNODICAL, sĕ-nŏd'ĕ-kăl.

SYNODICK, sĕ-nŏd'ĭk. (509). a. Relating to a Synod, transacted in a Synod; reckoned from one conjunction with the sun to another.

SYSTEMATIZE, sĭs-tĕm'ă-tize. v. a. To reduce to a system.—Mason.

☞ I have met with this word nowhere but in Mason's Supplement to Johnson, and there I find it accented in a different way from what I have always heard it in conversation. In those circles which I have frequented, the accent has been placed on the first syllable; and if we survey the words of this termination, we shall find that ize is added to every word without altering the place of the accent; and that consequently Systematize ought to have the accent on the first syllable. This reasoning is specious; but when we consider that this word is not formed from the English word System, but from the Greek Συστημα, or the latter Latin Systema, we shall find that the accent is very properly placed on the second syllable according to the general rule. If we place the accent on the first, we ought to spell the word Systemize, and then it would be analogically pronounced; but as our best writers and speakers have formed the word on the Greek and Latin plan, it ought to be written and pronounced as Mr. Mason has given it.

SYSTOLE, sĭs'tŏ-lē. s. (96). In Anatomy, the contraction of the heart; in Grammar, the shortening of a long syllable.

TARGE, tārje. s. A poetical word for Target.

TARGET, tār'gĕt. s. (381). A kind of buckler or shield borne on the left arm.

☞ Mr. Perry and Mr. Barclay are the only orthoepists who make the g in this word soft: Mr. Sheridan, Mr. Scott, Mr. Nares, Dr. Kenrick, W. Johnston, Dyche, and that profound searcher into English sounds, Mr Elphinston, make it hard, as in forget: and if etymology be any rule, the Erse word an tsaargeit is decidedly in favour of this pronunciation; for almost all our English words which have the g hard before e and i are of Erse or Saxon original. See Principles, No. 380, 381.

To TAUNT, tánt, or táwnt. v. a. To reproach, to insult, to revile, to ridicule.

☞ I have every orthoepist in the language against me in the preference I give to the first sound of this word, except Mr. Elphinston; and his authority as an analogist outweighs every other. I see no good reason why this word should have the broad sound of a, and not aunt, haunt, flaunt, jaunt, and the proper name Saunders; nor is my ear much accustomed to hear it so pronounced.—See SAUNTER, HAUNT, and Principles, No. 214.

TAUNT, tánt. s. (214). Insult, scoff, reproach.

☞ I have long wished to insert this word into my vocabulary, from a conviction of its utility in conversing on the sounds of words, but was deterred for want of an authority from any of our Dictionaries, when upon reading the very learned and ingenious Essay on the Prosodies of the Greek and Latin Languages, I found the word used in exactly that manner, which shows the propriety, and even necessity of adopting it. The learned author says, "The most extraordinary tautophony which he [Eustathius] mentions, is that of the vowels ι and η, in the proper names of the goddesses Ἰρις and Ἶρη." On the Prosodies of the Greek and Latin languages. Printed for Robson, 1796.

☞ The quantity of e in the first syllable of this word, and its relatives tenet, tenor, and tenure, is one of the most puzzling difficulties of pronunciation. How differently this letter is pronounced by different speakers may be gathered from a view of those orthoepists who have marked the quantity of the vowels:

Sheridan,	tēnable,	tēnet,	tĕnor,	tēnure.
Kenrick,	tĕnable,	tĕnet,	tĕnor,	tēnure.
Nares,	tēnable,	——,	tĕnor,	tēnure.
Ash,	tēnable,	tēnet,	tĕnor,	tĕnure.
Scott,	tĕnable,	tĕnet,	tĕnor,	tēnure.
Entick,	tĕnable,	tĕnet,	tĕnor,	tĕnure.
Perry,	tĕnable,	tĕnet,	tĕnor,	tēnure.
W. Johnston,	tēnable,	tĕnet,	tĕnor,	tēnure.
Bailey,	———	———	———	tēnure.
Buchanan,	tĕnable,	——,	tĕnor,	tēnure.
Fry,	tēnable,	tĕnet,	tĕnor,	tēnure.
Smith,	——,	tĕnet,	———	———
Elphinston.	———,	tĕnor,	———

From this survey of our Dictionaries we find them uniform only in the word tenor. They are nearly equally divided on the word tenet; and if similitude were to decide, it would be clearly in favour of the short vowel, in this word, as well as in tenor.—They are both Latin words, and both have the vowel short in the original. This, however, is no reason with those who understand the analogy of English pronunciation, (for tremor, minor, &c. have the first vowel short in Latin) (544); but it sufficiently shows the partiality of the ear to the short vowel in words of this form, as is evident in the word tenant. The word tenable seems rather derived from the French tenable than the Latin teneo, and, being of a different form, comes under a different analogy. The termination able, though derived from the Latin abilis, is frequently annexed to mere English words, as pleasurable, pasturable, &c. and therefore makes no alteration in the quantity of the word to which it is subjoined (501). But as tenable must be considered as a simple in our language, the shortening power of the antepenultimate accent alone seems to determine the quantity of the first syllable of this word, which, like gelable, probable, &c. has the short quantity of the original Latin to plead; a plea which seems to have some weight in words of this termination, where the antepenultimate accent appears to have less influence than in most of the other classes of words. See PLACABLE. The word tenure seems inclined to lengthen the first vowel, in order to distinguish itself from tenor; and as there are no good reasons for shortening it, this reason seems sufficient to turn the balance in its favour, even if it had not an analogy and such a weight of usage on its side.

TETCHY, tĕtsh'ē. a. Froward, peevish.

TETE-A-TETE, tāte'ā-tāte'. French. Cheek by jowl.

TETHER, tĕth'ŭr. s. (469). A string by which cattle are held from pasturing too wide.

☞ All our lexicographers seem to prefer this word to tedder, except Barclay and Junius, who refer us from tether to tedder; and yet nothing can be clearer than its derivation from the Belgic word tudder, which Junius explains to be a rope by which horses or other cattle are tied to keep them from straying; and this, he says, undoubtedly comes from the Irish tead, a rope. While Skinner, without his usual judgement, derives it from the Latin tentor, because it restrains cattle from straying. But though tether is much more in use than tedder, it is certainly not so legitimately formed, and ought not to have the preference.

TETRAGONAL, tē-trăg'gō-năl. a. Square (518).

TETRARCH, tē'trārk, or tĕt'rārk. s. A Roman governor of the fourth part of a province.

☞ Mr. Sheridan, Mr. Scott, and Mr. Perry, are for the first pronunciation of this word, and Buchanan and Entick for the second. Let those who plead the Latin quantity for the short sound of e, peruse Principles, No. 544.

TETRARCHATE, tē-trār'kāte. } s.
TETRARCHY, tĕt'trār-kē. (503). }

THANKWORTHY, *th*ăngk'wŭr-*th*ė. a. Deserving gratitude.

THAT, *th*ăt. pronoun demonstrative. Not this, but the other; it sometimes serves to save the repetition of a word or words foregoing; opposed to This, as The Other to One; when This and That relate to foregoing words, This is referred to the latter, and That to the former; such as; that which, what; the thing; by way of eminence (50).

☞ When this word is used as a pronoun demonstrative, it has always an accent on it, and is heard distinctly rhyming with bat, mat, &c. Thus in Pope's Essay on Criticism, v. 5.

"But of the two, less dang'rous is th' of"fence
"To tire our patience, than mislead our "sense,
"Some few in that, but numbers err in this;
"Ten censure wrong, for one who writes
"amiss."

Here the word that is as distinctly pronounced as any other accented word in the language.

THAT, *th*ăt. pron. relative. Which, relating to an antecedent thing; who, relating to an antecedent person.

☞ When this word is a relative pronoun, and is arranged in a sentence with other words, it never can have an accent, and is therefore much less distinctly pronounced than the foregoing word. In this case the a goes into that obscure sound it generally has when unaccented (88), as may be heard in pronouncing it in the following passage from Pope's Essay on Criticism, v. 297.

"True wit is nature to advantage dress'd,
"What oft was thought, but ne'er so well
"express'd;
"Something, whose truth, convinc'd at sight,
"we find,
"That gives us back the image of our mind."

Here we find the a so obscured as to approach nearly to short u; and, without any perceptible difference in the sound, the word might be written thut (92).

THAT, *th*ăt. conjunct. (50) (466). Because; noting a consequence; noting indication; noting a final end, in That, as being.

☞ What has been observed of the pronunciation of this word, when a relative pronoun, is perfectly applicable to it when a conjunction; in either case it never has the accent, and necessarily goes into an obscure sound like short u. Thus in the following passage from Pope's Essay on Criticism:

"The vulgar thus through imitation err:
"As oft' the learn'd, by being singular:
"So much they scorn the crowd, that if the "throng
"By chance go right, they purposely go
"wrong."

Here the conjunction that is pronounced with exactly the same degree of obscurity as when a relative pronoun.

The word that, by being sometimes a demonstrative pronoun, sometimes a relative, and sometimes a conjunction, may produce a quadruple repetition of the same word, which, though not elegant, is strictly grammatical; a repetition which is, perhaps, peculiar to the English language.—This is humorously exemplified by Mr. Steele in the Spectator, No. 80, in the Just remonstrance of affronted THAT, where he brings in this word, declaring how useful it had been to a great orator, who, in a speech to the Lords, had said, "My Lords, with humble submission, "that that I say, is; that that that that "gentleman has advanced is not that that "he should have proved to your Lord-"ships." In the pronunciation of this passage, it is plain that the word that which is not printed in italicks, is pronounced nearly as if written thut. I am sensible of the delicacy of the obscure sound of this a, and therefore do not offer u as a perfect equivalent, but as the nearest approach to it, and as the means of pointing out the power of the accent and its importance in ascertaining the sense; for if all these words were pronounced equally distinct, it is plain the sense would be obscured: and so liable are the relative, the conjunction, and the demonstrative, to be confounded, that some writers have distinguished the latter by printing it in italicks. Those who wish to see the most profound and ingenious investigation of the grammatical origin of these words, must consult Horne Tooke's Diversions of Purley.

THATCH, *th*åtsh. s. (466). Straw laid upon the top of a house to keep out the weather.

To THATCH, *th*åtsh. v. a. To cover as with straw.

THATCHER, *th*åtsh'ŭr. s. One who covers houses with straw.

To THAW, *th*âw. v. n. (466). To grow liquid after congelation, to melt; to remit the cold which had caused frost.

To THAW, *th*âw. v. a. To melt what was congealed.

THAW, *th*âw. s. Liquefaction of any thing congealed; warmth, such as liquefies congelation.

THE, THĖ, or THĔ. art. (466). The article noting a particular thing; before a vowel, E is commonly cut off in verse.

☞ Mr. Sheridan has given us these two modes of pronouncing this word, but has not told us when we are to use one, and when the other. To supply this deficiency, therefore, it may be observed, that when the is prefixed to a word beginning with a consonant, it has a short sound, little more than the sound of th without the e; and when it precedes a word beginning with a vowel, the e is sounded plainly and distinctly. This difference will be perceptible by comparing the pen, the hand, &c. with the oil, the air, &c.; or the difference of this word before ancients and moderns in the following Couplet of Pope.

"Some foreign writers, some our own de"spise;
"The ancients only, or the moderns prize."

A very imperfect way of pronouncing this word very frequently arises in verse, where the poet, for the preservation of the metre, cuts off e by an apostrophe, and unites the article to the following word. This pronunciation depraves the sound of the verse without necessity, as the syllable formed by e is so short as to admit of being sounded with the preceding syllable, so as not to increase the number of syllables to the ear, or to hurt the melody.

"'Tis hard to say if greater want of skill
"Appear in writing, or in judging ill:
"But of the two, less dang'rous is th' offence
"To tire our patience, than mislead our
"sense." Pope.

———"Him, the Almighty Power,
"Hurl'd headlong flaming from th' ethereal
"sky,
"With hideous ruin and combustion, down
"To bottomless perdition, there to dwell
"In adamantine chains and penal fire,
"Who durst defy th' Omnipotent to arms."
Milton.

In these examples we see the particle the may either form a distinct syllable, or not. In the third line from Pope the first the forms a distinct syllable, but the second is sunk into the succeeding noun. The same may be observed of this particle in the first, second, and sixth lines of the passage from Milton: but what appears strange is, that though the particle the before a vowel, and shortened by an apostrophe, does not augment the number of syllables, it is really pronounced longer than where it forms a syllable, and is not thus shortened by elision. This is apparent in the third line from Pope,

"But of the two, less dang'rous is th' of-
"fence."

The reason why the first the, though pronounced shorter than the second, forms a syllable, and the second does not, seems to arise from the coalescence of the vowels, which, though lengthened in sound, may still be pronounced with one impulse of the breath. Thus when a consonant follows the particle the, we find two distinct impulses, though the e is dropped; but when a vowel follows the, the impulse on the particle slides over, as it were, to the consonant of the succeeding syllable, without forming two distinct impulses, nearly as if a y were interposed, and the words were written th'yoffence, th'omnipotent, &c.

I would not, however, be supposed to disapprove of the practice of eliding the e before a vowel to the eve when the verse requires it; this practice is founded on good sense; and the first line in the passage from Milton shows the necessity of making the distinction, when it is, and when it is not, to be elided; what I wish to reform is, the practice of shortening the e to the ear, and thus mincing and impoverishing the sound of the verse without necessity.

THY, THĪ, or THĒ. pron. (466). Of thee, belonging to thee.

☞ From what has been already observed under the pronoun my, we are naturally led to suppose, that the word thy, when not emphatical, ought to follow the same analogy, and be pronounced like the, as we frequently hear it on the stage; but if we reflect that reading or reciting is a perfect picture of speaking, we shall be induced to think that, in this particular, the stage is wrong. The second personal pronoun thy is not, like my, the common language of every subject; it is used only where the subject is either raised above common life, or sunk below it into the mean and familiar. When the subject is elevated above common life, it adopts a language suitable to such an elevation, and the pronunciation of this language ought to be as far removed from the familiar as the language itself. Thus, in prayer, pronouncing thy like the, even when unemphatical, would be intolerable; while suffering thy, when unemphatical, to slide into the in the pronunciation of slight and familiar composition, seems to lower the sound to the language, and form a proper distinction between different subjects. If, therefore, it should be asked why, in reciting epic or tragic composition, we ought always to pronounce thy rhyming with high, while my, when unemphatical, sinks into the sound of me, it may be answered, because my is the common language of every subject, while thy is confined to subjects either elevated above common life, or sunk below it into the negligent and familiar. —When, therefore, the language is elevated, the uncommonness of the word thy, and its full sound rhyming with high, is suitable to the dignity of the subject: but the slender sound like the gives it a familiarity only suitable to the language of endearment or negligence, and for this very reason is unfit for the dignity of epic or tragic composition. Thus in the following passages from Milton:

"Say first, for heav'n hides nothing from thy "view,
"Nor the deep tract of hell."
Parad. Lost. b. 1.

"O thou, that with surpassing glory "crown'd,
"Look'st from thy sole dominion, like the "God
"Of this new world; at whose sight all the "stars
"Hide their diminish'd heads; to thee I call,
"But with no friendly voice, and add thy "name,
"O sun, to tell thee how I hate thy beams."
Parad. Lost. b. 4.

Here pronouncing the pronoun thy like the word the, would familiarize and debase the language to prose. The same may be observed of the following passages from Addison's tragedy of Cato:

"Now, Cæsar, let thy troops beset our gates,
"And bar each avenue; thy gathering fleets
"O'erspread the sea, and stop up ev'ry port;
"Cato may open to himself a passage,
"And mock thy hopes."———

Here the impropriety of pronouncing thy like the is palpable: nor would it be much more excusable in the following speech of Portius, in the first scene of the same tragedy:

"Thou see'st not that thy brother is thy ri-"val;
"But I must hide it, for I know thy temper.
"Now, Marcus, now thy virtue's on the "proof;
"Put forth thy utmost strength, work every "nerve,
"And call up all thy father in thy soul."

—nŏ, mŏve, nŏr, nŏt;—tūbe, tŭb, bŭll;—ŏil;—pŏund;—thin, THIS.

As this pronoun is generally pronounced on the stage, it would be difficult for the ear to distinguish whether the words are,

"Thou know'st not that thy brother is thy "rival," or

"Thou know'st not that the brother is the "rival," &c.

And this may be one reason why the slender pronunciation of thy should be avoided as much as possible.

Perhaps it will be urged, that though these passages require thy to be pronounced so as to rhyme with high, there are other instances in tragedy where the subject is low and familiar, which would be better pronounced by sounding thy like the: to which it may be answered, that when tragedy lowers her voice, and descends into the mean and familiar, as is frequently the case in the tragedies of Shakespeare, the slender pronunciation of thy may be adopted, because, though the piece may have the name of a tragedy; the scene may be really comedy. The only rule, therefore, that can be given, is a very indefinite one; namely, that thy ought always to be pronounced so as to rhyme with high when the subject is raised, and the personage dignified; but when the subject is familiar and the person we address, without dignity or importance, if thy be the personal pronoun made use of, it ought to be pronounced like the: thus, if, in a familiar way, we say to a friend, Give me thy hand, we never hear the pronoun thy sounded so as to rhyme with high: and it is always pronounced like the when speaking to a child; we say, Mind thy book, hold up thy head, or, Take off thy hat. The phraseology we call thee and thouing is not in so common use with us as the tutoyant among the French: but as the second personal pronoun thou, and its possessive thy are indispensable in composition, it seems of some importance to pronounce them properly.—See Rhetorical Grammar, page 32.

TIRE, tīr. s. See TIER. Rank, row.

☞ As this word, when it signifies a rank or row, is universally pronounced like tear, a drop from the eye, it ought always to be written tier; which would prevent a gross irregularity. This is the more to be wished, not only as its derivation from the old French tiere seems to require this spelling, but to distinguish it from the word tiere, a head-dress; which probably, being a corruption either of the word tiara, an ornament for the head, or of the English word attire, ought to be written and pronounced like the word tire, to fatigue. Dr. Kenrick is the only orthoepist who has attended to this distinction.—See BOWL

To, tŏŏ. ad. A particle coming between two verbs, and noting the second as the object of the first; it notes the intention, as she raised a war To call me back; after an adjective it notes its object, as born To beg; noting futurity, as we are still To seek; To and again, To and fro, backward and forward.

☞ What has been observed of the word The, respecting the length of the e before a vowel, and its shortness before a consonant, is perfectly applicable to the preposition, and the adverb To. This will be palpable in the pronunciation of the verb to begin and to end, and in the phrase, I went to London, he went to Eaton. It may be observed too, that this word, though deprived of its o to the eye, always preserves it to the ear. Whether we see it elided, as in Pope's Essay on Man:

"Say what the use were finer optics giv'n,
"T'inspect a mite, not comprehend the
"heav'n?"

Or preserved with an apostrophe after it, as in Milton:

"For still they knew, and ought to'have still
"remember'd,
"The high injunction not to taste that fruit,
"Whoever tempted."

In both these instances the word to ought to be pronounced in exactly the same manner; that is, like the number two.

To, tŏŏ. preposition. See the Adverb. Noting motion toward, opposed to From; noting accord or adaptation; noting address or compellation, as, Here's to you all; noting a state or place whither any one goes, as, Away to horse; noting opposition, as, Foot to foot; noting amount, as, To the number of three hundred; noting proportion, as, Three to nine; noting perception, as, Sharp to the taste; in comparison of, as, No fool to the sinner; as far as; toward.

TOUR, tōōr. s. (315). Ramble, roving journey; turn, revolution.

☞ My experience fails me if this word is not slowly conforming to the true English sound of the vowels heard in thou. The smart traveller to France and Italy, would fear we should never suppose he had been out of England, were he not to pronounce it so as to rhyme with poor; and the sober English critick sees infinite advantage in this pronunciation, as it prevents our mistaking taking a tour for taking a tower. But plausible as this latter reason may be, it is far from being sufficient to induce a philosophical grammarian to approve it.—Coincidence in the sound of words signifying different things, is the case in all languages; but while these words are differently written, their different meanings will be sufficiently preserved without departing from the general analogy of pronunciation. —See the word BOWL.

TOURNAMENT, tŏŏr'nă-mĕnt, or tûr'nă-mĕnt. } s.
TOURNEY, tŏŏr'nē, or tûr'nē.

Tilt, military sport, mock encounter; Milton uses it simply for encounter.

☞ I am much mistaken if general usage does not incline to the short sound of the diphthong in these words; and that this sound ought to be indulged, is palpable to every English ear; which finds a repugnance at giving the French sound to any word that is not newly adopted. Journey, nourish, courage, and many other words from the French, have long been anglicised; and there is no good reason why this word should not fall into the same class. Mr. Sheridan, Mr. Scott, Dr. Kenrick, and Mr. Perry, give the first sound of this word; and Buchanan and W. Johnston, the second. Junius and Skinner spell the word Turnament.

To TOURNEY, tŏŏr'nē, or tûr'nē. v. n. To tilt in the lists.

TOURNIQUET, tûr'nē-kwĕt. s. A bandage used in amputations, straitened or relaxed by the turn of a handle.

☞ The general pronunciation of this word ought to induce us to the second pronunciation of Tournament.

To TOUSE, tŏŏze. v. a. (313). To pull, to tear, to haul, to drag; whence Touser, or Towser, the name of a mastiff.

a direction to: near to, as the danger now comes Towards him; with respect to, touching, regarding; with tendency to; nearly, little less than.

☞ Notwithstanding our poets almost universally accent this word on the first syllable, and the poets are pretty generally followed by good speakers, there are some, and those not of the lowest order, who still place the accent on the second. These should be reminded, that as Inwards, outwards, backwards, forwards, and every other word of the same form, have the accent on the first syllable, there is not the least reason for pronouncing towards with the accent on the last. All our orthoepists place the accent on the first syllable of toward when an adjective. Towards, being always a preposition, has the accent on the first syllable by Mr. Scott; but Mr. Perry, Barclay, and Fenning, place it on the second. From the coalescence of the o with the w, this word is pronounced gerally in one syllable, though Dr. Kenrick says otherwise. Mr. Sheridan so pronounces it; Mr. Nares and Mr. Smith rhyme it with boards: Bailey accents the first syllable of toward, and Entick the same syllable on the same word, and on towards as a preposition.

☞ In this word we have a striking instance of the aversion of the language to what may be called a Tautophony, or a successive repetition of the same sound. We find no repugnance at aspiring the d in Comedian, and pronouncing it as if written Co-me-je-an; but there is no ear that would not be hurt at pronouncing Tragedian as if written Tra-je-je-an. The reason is evident. The ge that immediately precedes being exactly the same sound as di when aspirated into je, the ear will not suffer the repetition, and therefore dispenses with the laws of aspiration, rather than offend against those of harmony. To the same reason we must attribute giving the sound of zh to the double s in Abscission, and to the ti in Transition. The same aversion to the repetition of similar sounds makes us drop the first aspiration in Diphthong, Triphthong, Ophthalmy, &c.—See OPHTHALMICK.

☞ I prefer the first mode of pronouncing this word to the second, though, at first sight, it appears not so regular. My reason is, the aversion our language has to a repetition of exactly similar words. The s in the prefix trans is always sharp and hissing, and that inclines us to vary the succeeding aspiration, by giving it the flat instead of the sharp sound. This is the best reason I can give for the very prevailing custom of pronouncing this termination in this word contrary to analogy.—When I asked Mr. Garrick to pronounce this word, he, without premeditation, gave it in the first manner; but when I desired him to repeat his pronunciation, he gave it in the second:

"As one who in his journey bates at noon,
"Though bent on speed, so here the Arch-
"angel paus'd,
"Betwixt the world destroy'd and world res-
"tor'd,
"If Adam aught perhaps might interpose,
"Then with transition sweet new speech re-
"sumes." Milton.

I think, however, it may be classed among those varieties where we shall neither be much applauded for being right, nor blamed for being wrong.

TRANSITIVE, trăns'ė-tĭv. a. Having the power of passing; in Grammar, a verb Transitive is that which signifies an action conceived as having an effect upon some object, as, I strike the earth.

TRAVERSE, trâ-vêrse'. ad. Crosswise, athwart.

☞ In the folio edition of Johnson the word Traverse, when an adverb or a preposition, is accented on the last syllable as I have marked it; but in the quarto, it is every where accented on the first. Mr. Sheridan accents only the preposition on the last. Dr. Ash says the verb was formerly accented on the last; and Buchanan has given it so accented: all the rest of our orthoepists accent the word every where on the first; but the distinction in which I have followed Dr. Johnson's folio, I must think the most accurate.

TRIGON, trī'gŏn. s. A triangle.

TRIGONAL, trĭg'ō-năl. a. Triangular, having three corners.

☞ I have made the first syllable of this word short, as I am convinced it is agreeable to the genius of English pronunciation to shorten every antepenultimate vowel except u, when not followed by a diphthong (535). This is evident in tripartite, triplicate, and a thousand other words, notwithstanding the specific meaning of the first syllable, which, in words of two syllables when the accent is on the first, and in polysyllables when the accent is on the second, ought, according to analogy, to have the i long.——See Principles, No. 530, 535.

which the priestess of Apollo delivered oracles.

☞ The first mode of pronouncing this word is that which is adopted by Mr. Sheridan, Dr. Kenrick, Bailey, Buchanan, and Perry; and the second, by Dr. Ash, Mr. Nares, Mr. Scott, Entick, and Fry. I do not hesitate to pronounce the former the most agreeable to English analogy: not only because the prefixes, bi and tri, when no other law forbids, ought to be made as distinct as possible, but because all words of two syllables with the accent on the first, and having one consonant between two vowels, ought, if custom does not absolutely forbid, to have the vowel in the first syllable long. This is the genuine English analogy; the mode in which we pronounce all Latin words of this form, let the quantity be what it will (544); and the mode in which we should have pronounced all English words of this form, if an affectation of Latinity had not often prevented us. For the same reason, therefore, that we pronounced biped, trigon, and trident, with the i long, we ought to adopt the first pronunciation of the word in question, and not the second. —See DRAMA.

To TRIUMPH, trī'ŭmf. v. n. To celebrate a victory with pomp, to rejoice for victory; to obtain victory; to insult upon an advantage gained.

☞ This verb, says Mr. Nares, was, even till Dryden's time, pronounced with the accent either on the first or last syllable. Accenting the last, was according to the general rule. See Principles No. 503, n. But it is now, as Mr. Nares observes, invariably accented on the first, notwithstanding the analogy I have remarked, and the general propensity to give a dissyllable noun and verb a different accentuation (492).

To TWEEDLE, twêê'dl. v. a. (246). To handle lightly.

☞ This word seems formed from the sound of certain soft lengthened notes upon the fiddle, and therefore very properly used by Addison, in the sense of wheedle, but with additional propriety and humour, where he says, "A fidler had brought in "with him a body of lusty young fellows, "whom he had tweedled into the service." The sarcastic couplet of Swift,

"'Tis strange there should such difference be,
"'Twixt tweedle dum and tweedle dee."

VARIABLY, vā-rē-â-blē. ad. Changeably, mutably, inconstantly, uncertainly.

VARIANCE, vā'rē-ânse. s. Discord, disagreement, dissention.

VARIATION, vā-rē-ā'shŭn. s. Change, mutation, difference from itself; difference, change from one to another; successive change; in Grammar, change of termination of nouns; deviation; Variation of the compass, deviation of the magnetick needle from parallel with the meridian.

☞ The a in the first syllable of this word, from the lengthening power of the succeeding vowels, continues long and slender as in various. The same may be observed of variegation. Mr. Sheridan has given a in these two words the short sound of the Italian a, but contrary to the analogy of English pronunciation.—See Principles, No. 534.

To VARIEGATE, vā'rē-ē-gāte. v. a. To diversify; to stain with different colours.

☞ All our orthöepists are uniform in placing the accent on the first syllable of this word, and all sound the a as in vary, except Mr. Elphinston, Mr. Perry, and Buchanan, who give it the short sound as in carry. That so great a master of English analogy as Mr. Elphinston should here overlook the lengthening power of the vocal assemblage ie, is not a little surprising. —See Principles, No. 196.

VARIEGATION, vā'-rē-ē-gā'shŭn. s. Diversity of colours.

VARIETY, vā-rī'ē-tē. s. Change, succession of one thing to another, intermixture; one thing of many by which variety is made; difference, dissimilitude; variation, deviation, change from a former state.

VARLETRY, vär'lĕt-trē. s. Rabble, crowd, populace.

VARNISH, vär'nĭsh. s. A matter laid upon wood, metal, or other bodies, to make them shine; cover, palliation.

To VARNISH, vär'nĭsh. v. a. To cover with something shining; to cover, to conceal with something ornamental; to palliate, to hide with colour of rhetorick.

VARNISHER, vär'nĭsh-ŭr. s. One whose trade is to varnish; a disguiser, an adorner.

To VARY, vā'rē. v. a. To change, to make unlike itself; to change to something else; to make of different kinds; to diversify, to variegate.

To VARY, vā'rē. v. n. To be changeable, to appear in different forms, to be unlike each other; to alter, to become unlike itself; to deviate, to depart; to succeed each other; to disagree, to be at variance; to shift colours.

VARY, vā'rē. s. Change, alteration. Obsolete.

VASCULAR, vās'kū-lär. a. (88). Consisting of vessels, full of vessels.

VASE, vāze. s. A vessel rather for ornament than use.

☞ Mr. Sheridan has pronounced this word so as to rhyme with base, case, &c. I have uniformly heard it pronounced with the s like z, and sometimes, by people of refinement, with the a like aw; but this being too refined for the general ear, is now but seldom heard.

Mr. Sheridan, Mr. Scott, Dr. Kenrick, W. Johnston, Mr. Smith, Mr. Perry, and Buchanan, pronounce the a long and slender as I have done, but with the s as in case: Mr. Smith and W. Johnston give the a the same sound, and the s the sound of z; and Mr. Elphinston sounds it as if written vauz: but this, as Mr. Nares justly observes, is an affected pronunciation.

VASSAL, vās'sāl. s. (88). One who holds by the will of a superior lord; a subject, a dependent; a servant, one who acts by the will of another; a slave, a low wretch.

VASSALLAGE, vās'sāl-āge. s. (90). The state of a vassal; tenure at will, servitude, slavery.

VAST, vāst. a. (79). Large, great; viciously great, enormously extensive.

VAULT, vâwlt, or vâwt. s. A continued arch; a cellar; a cave, a cavern; a repository for the dead.

☞ Mr. Sheridan leaves out the l in this word, in the word vault, to leap, and all their compounds; but my ear grossly deceives me if this l is ever suppressed, except in the sense of a cellar for wine, &c. In this I am supported by all our orthoepists, from whom the sounds of the letter can be gathered; and Mr. Scott and Mr. Perry preserve the l in every word of this form. This, I think, is not agreeable to general usage with respect to the exception I have given; though I think it might be dispensed with for the sake of uniformity, especially as the old French voulte, the Italian volta, and the lower Latin volta, from which the word is derived, have all of them the l; nor do I think the preservation of it in the word in question would incur the least imputation of pedantry.

To VAULT, vâwlt. v. a. To arch, to shape as a vault; to cover with an arch.

To VAULT, vâwlt. v. n. To leap, to jump; to play the tumbler or posture-master.

VAULT, vâwlt. s. A leap, a jump.

VAULTER, vâwlt'ŭr. s. (98). A leaper, a jumper, a tumbler.

VAULTY, vâwl'tė. a. Arched, concave.

To VAUNT, vâwnt. v. a. (216). To boast, to display with ostentation.

☞ Mr. Nares is the only orthoepist who gives the diphthong in this word and avaunt the same sound as in aunt; but a few more such respectable judges, by setting the example, would reduce these words to their proper class; till then the whole army of lexicographers and speakers, particularly on the stage, must be submitted to (214).

VENEMOUS, vĕn'ŭm-ŭs. a. Poisonous.

To VENENATE, vĕn'ĕ-nāte. v. a. To poison, to infect with poison.

☞ In the first edition of this Dictionary I accented this word on the first syllable, contrary to the example of Dr. Johnson, Dr. Ash, and Mr. Sheridan; but, upon a revisal of the various analogies of accentuation, was inclined to think this accentuation somewhat doubtful. The word venemo, from which this is formed, has the penultimate long; and in verbs of this termination, derived from the Latin, and preserving the same number of syllables, we often preserve the same accent, as in arietate, coacervate, denigrate, &c.; but this is so often neglected in favour of the antepenultimate accent, as in decorate, defatigate, delegate, desolate, &c. that general usage seems evidently leaning to this side; and as in perpetrate and emigrate, from perpetro and emigro, where the penultimate vowel is doubtful, we always place the accent on the antepenultimate; so in VENISON, vĕn'z'n, or vĕn'ē-z'n. s. Game, beast of chase, the flesh of deer.

☞ A shameful corruption of this word by entirely sinking the i, has reduced it to two syllables. Mr. Sheridan pronounces it in three; Dr. Kenrick gives it in three, but tells us it is usually heard in two. Mr. Scott gives it both ways; Mr. Perry only as it is contracted; and Mr. Elphinston supposes the i in this word, as much lost as in business.

It is highly probable this corruption is of long standing; for though Shakespeare, in As You Like It, says,

"Come, shall we go and kill us venison?"

Yet Chapman pronounces this word in two syllables,

"To our venson's store
"We added wine till we could wish no
"more."

And Dryden after him,

"He for the feast prepar'd,
"In equal portions with the ven'son shar'd."

To these instances we may add an excellent poet of our own time:

"Gorgonius sits abdominous and wan,
"Like a fat squab upon a Chinese fan;
"He snuffs far off th' anticipated joy;
"Turtle and ven'son all his thoughts employ."

Poetry will ever consider this word, like many others, either as of two or three syllables; but solemn prose, such as the language of scripture, will always give the word its due length. For however we may be accustomed to hear ven'son in common conversation, what disgust would it not give us to hear this word in the pulpit, when Isaac says to his son:

"Now therefore take, I pray thee, thy wea"pons, thy quiver, and thy bow, and
"go out to the field, and take me some
"ven'son!"

In short, my opinion is, that this word, in spite of the general corruption, ought always to be pronounced in three syllables by correct speakers, and that the contraction should be left to the poets.

VENOM, vĕn'ŭm. s. (166). Poison.

VENOMOUS, vĕn'ŭm-ŭs. a. Poisonous; malignant; mischievous.

VERB, verb. s. A part of speech signifying existence, or some modification thereof, as action, passion.

VERBAL, vĕr'bāl. a. (88). Spoken, not written; oral, uttered by mouth; consisting in mere words; literal, having word answering to word. A verbal noun is a noun derived from a verb.

To VERBALIZE, vĕr'bāl-īze. v. n. To use many words to protract a discourse.

☞ This word is certainly useful in this sense, as we have no other active or neuter verb to express being verbose: but there is another sense in which it may be no less useful, and that is, when we want express the forming of a noun into a verb, as from arm, to arm, &c.

VERBALITY, vĕr-bāl'ē-tē. s. Mere bare words.

VERBALLY, vĕr'bāl-ē. ad. In words, orally; word for word.

VERBATIM, vĕr'bā'tĭm. ad. Word for word.

(559).—Fāte, fār, fāll, fāt;—mē, mĕt;—pine, pĭn;—

This word is perfectly anglicised, and therefore ought to have its last syllable pronounced according to English analogy, like Centre, Sceptre, Mitre, &c. See Principles, No. 416. There is a common mistake in the use of the Latin word from which this is derived, which it may not be improper to rectify. Vertebra is not unfrequently used to signify the whole collection of joints which form the back bone, while in reality it means only one of those joints; the plural is Vertebræ, and this ought to be used for the whole spine, if we denominate it by a Latin word; but if we speak English, it ought to be Vertebres, and pronounced as if written Verteburs.

VERTEX, vĕr'tĕks. s. Zenith, the point overhead; the top of a hill.

VERTICAL, vĕr'tĕ-kăl. a. (88). Placed in the zenith; placed in a direction perpendicular to the horizon.

VERTICALITY, vĕr-tĕ-kăl'ĕ-tĕ. s. The state of being in the zenith.

VERTICALLY, vĕr'tĕ-kăl-ĕ. ad. In the zenith.

VERTICITY, vĕr-tĭs'ĕ-tĕ. s. The power of turning, circumlocution, rotation.

VERTIGINOUS, vĕr-tĭd'jĭn-ŭs. a. Turning round, rotatory; giddy.

VERTIGO, vĕr-tī'gō, vĕr-tē'gō, or vĕr'tĕ-gō. s. (112). A giddiness, a sense of turning in the head.

This word is exactly under the same predicament as Serpigo and Lentigo. If we pronounce it learnedly, we must place the accent in the first manner (503). If we pronounce it modishly, and wish to smack of the French or Italian, we must adopt the second; but if we follow the genuine English analogy, we must pronounce it in the last manner.—See Principles, No. 112. The authorities for the first pronunciation are, Mr. Elphinston, Mr. Sheridan, Bailey, and Entick; for the second, Dr. Kenrick, Mr. Nares, Mr. Scott, and W. Johnston; and for the third, Dr Johnson, Dr. Ash, Mr. Perry, Buchanan, Barclay, and Fenning. This too was Swift's pronunciation, as we see by Dr. Johnson's quotation:

"And that old vertigo in's head,
"Will never leave him till he's dead."

In this word we see the tendency of the accent to its true centre in its own language. Vertigo with the accent on the i, and that pronounced long as in title, has so Latin a sound that we scarcely think we are speaking English: this makes us the more readily give into the foreign sound of i, as in fatigue. This sound a correct English ear is soon weary of, and settles at last with the accent on the first syllable, with the i sounded as in indigo, portico, &c.

VETERAN, vĕt'ŭr-ăn. a. Long practised in war, long experienced.

VETERINARY, vĕt'ĕr-ė-nā-rė. a. Belonging to cattle, particularly horses; from the Latin Veterinarius; a farrier, or horse-doctor.

☞ I have adopted this word from a prospect of its becoming a part of the language. As a College is founded in London for studying the diseases to which that useful animal is liable, the name of Veterinary College must come into general use, and ought therefore to have place in our Dictionaries. Ash is the only lexicographer who has it.

To VEX, vĕks. v. a. To plague, to torment, to harass; to disturb, to disquiet; to trouble with slight provocations.

VEXATION, vĕk-sā'shŭn. s. The act of troubling; the state of being troubled, uneasiness, sorrow; the cause of trouble or uneasiness; an act of harassing by law; a slight teazing trouble.

VICARIOUS, vī-kā'rė-ŭs. s. (138). Deputed, delegated, acting in the place of another.

VICARSHIP, vĭk'ŭr-ship. s. The office of a vicar.

VICE, vise. s. The course of action opposite to virtue; a fault, and offence; the fool, or punchinello of old-shows; a kind of small iron press with screws, used by workmen; gripe, grasp.

VICE, vise. s. This word is the ablative case of the Latin word vicis, and is used in composition for one who performs, in his stead, the office of a superior, or who has the second rank in command; as, a Viceroy, Vicechancellor.

☞ This word is somewhat similar to the prefix male, in malecontent, malpractice, &c. and seems to strengthen the reasons given under those words for pronouncing the first vowel long.

To VICE, vise. v. a. To draw. Obsolete.

VICEADMIRAL, vise-ăd'mė-răl. s. The second commander of a fleet; a naval officer of the second rank.

☞ This corruption, like most others, has terminated in the generation of a new word; for no solemnity will allow of pronouncing this word as it is written. Victuals appeared to Swift so contrary to the real sound, that in some of his manuscript remarks which I have seen, he spells the word Vittles. This compliance with sound, however, is full of mischief to language, and ought not to be indulged.—See SKEPTICK, and Principles, No. 550.]

☞ In this tribe of words we find a manifest difference between the simple villain and the compounds villany, villanous, &c. Dr. Johnson tells us, these words are derived from the French villain, or the low Latin villanus. Sometimes we find the word in question written villanny; and it is certain, that it either ought to be written so from the old French villonnie, with double l and double n, or from the modern French with these letters single: or if we must form it from our own word villain, (which we seldom choose to do if we can discover the most remote relation to other languages;) in this case, I say, we ought according to our own analogy, to spell the word villainy.

VILLATICK, vĭl-lăt'tĭk. a. (509). Belonging to villages.

☞ This word, says Johnson, Minshew, with great applause, from Skinner, derives from un pere; in French, a father.—But whatever may be its derivation, one should think, in pronunciation it ought to class with empire: and yet we find our orthŏepists considerably divided in the sound of the last syllable of both these words.

Empire. Dr. Kenrick, Mr. Scott, W. Johnston, and Mr. Perry, rhyme it with fire; but Mr. Sheridan and Buchanan, with the first of pyr-a-mid.

Umpire. Mr. Sheridan and W. Johnston rhyme it with fire; but Mr. Perry, Mr. Scott, and Buchanan, with fear; and Dr. Kenrick with the first of pyr-a-mid.

Amidst this variety and inconsistency we find a preponderancy to the long sound of i, as in fire: and this, in my opinion, is the most eligible.

Rampire and Vampyre follow the same analogy; and Satire and Samphire may be looked on as irregular.

UN, ŭn. A negative particle much used in composition. It is placed almost at will before adjectives and adverbs.

☞ Mr. Mason has very justly observed, that "one uniform effect is not always "created by un prefixed. Thus the word "unexpressive (as used by both Shake-"speare and Milton) is not barely made "negative by the composition, but is also "changed from active to passive." To these observations we may add, that Shakespeare and Milton's use of unexpressive for unexpressible or inexpressible, is very licentious, and ought not to be followed. The Latin preposition in and the English un are sufficiently ambiguous without such unmeaning licenses; which were introduced when the language was less studied; and perhaps merely to help out a hobbling line in poetry. The Latin preposition in is negative in insensible, and what is directly opposite to it, is intensive in inflammatory. The English preposition un is privative in untried; and, if I may be allowed the word retroactive, in to undo: a stick which has been bent, may, when made straight, be said to be unbent; but if it was previously straight, we cannot so properly say it is unbent, as that it is not bent. See UNPRINCIPLED.

UNKED, ŭng'kĕd. a. Uncooth, irksome, against the grain.

☞ This word is not in Johnson; but by its having a place in Junius, Skinner, Philips, Ash, and Barclay, it seems to have been once a living part of the language. It is at present, however, only heard in the mouths of the vulgar, from which state few words ever return into good usage. Junius explains it by solitary, and with great probability supposes it is a corruption of uncooth; but Skinner spells it unkward, and says it is a slight alteration of sense from the Teutonic, Ungehewer, which signifies a monster, a terrible or horrible thing, as solitude is supposed to be. Whatever its etymology may be, its utility can scarcely be disputed; for it has a shade of meaning peculiar to itself, which expresses a disagreeable passive state, arising from a concurrence of jarring circumstances. Thus we sometimes hear the common people say, I found myself very unked; it was very unked to do so. Now though irksome is the nearest word, and might supply the second phrase, it is quite incompatible with the first: nor is it a perfect equivalent to unked in the second; for irksome implies a much more disagreeable state than unked, which seems to mean a disagreeable state arising from obstacle, and therefore seems to form a middle sense between uncooth and irksome. In this sense the word appears to have been used by Charles Butler of Magdalen College, Oxford, in his English Grammar, 1634, where, speaking of the necessity of altering the orthography, he says, "Nevertheless, so powerful is the tyrant custom, opposing and oversweying right and reason, that I do easily believe this little change (though never so right, reasonable and profitable,) will seem to some harsh and unked at the first: but, after a while, being inured thereunto, I suppose they will rather wonder, how our ancient, eloquent, noble language, in other respects equalizing the best, could so long endure these gross and disgraceful barbarisms."—Preface to the Reader.

☞ Dr. Johnson very justly censures this word as improper, though authorised by Shakespeare, Bacon, Taylor, and Collier ; for, says he, there is no difference between rip and unrip : therefore the negative particle is of no force. But to this it may be observed, that the negative particle is not merely redundant ; it implies something in opposition to what it is prefixed to ; so that to unrip must signify joining together something that has been ripped : the inseparable preposition un is not like in used

—nŏ, mŏve, nŏr, nŏt;—tūbe, tŭb, bŭll;—ŏil;—pŏund;—thin, THIS.

☞ Mr. Sheridan, Dr. Kenrick, and Mr. Scott, pronounce the a in this word as I have marked it: Mr. Perry adopts the a in father; and though Mr. Smith thinks this is the true sound, confesses the short a is daily gaining ground; but W. Johnston, for want of attending to the rule laid down in Principles, No. 85, makes waft rhyme with soft: Mr. Nares has not got the word; but by omitting it in classes where the a is pronounced as in father and water, shows he is of opinion it ought to have the sound I have given it.

To WAFT, wâft. v. n. To float.

WAFT, wâft. s. A floating body; motion of a streamer.

WAFTAGE, wâft'ĭdje. s. (90). Carriage by water or air.

WAFTURE, wâf'tshŭre. s. (461). The act of waving.

To WAG, wăg. v. a. (85). To move lightly, to shake lightly.

To WAG, wăg. v. n. To be in quick or ludicrous motion; to go, to be moved.

WAG, wăg. s. One ludicrously mischievous, a merry droll.

To WAGE, wâdje. v. a. To attempt, to venture; to make, to carry on.

WAGER, wâ'jŭr. s. (98). A bett, any thing pledged upon a chance of performance.

To WAGER, wâ'jŭr. v. a. To lay, to pledge as a bett.

WAGES, wâ'jĭz. s. (99). Pay given for service.

WAGGERY, wăg'gŭr-ė. s. (555). Mischievous merriment, roguish trick, sarcastical gayety.

WAGGISH, wăg'ĭsh. a. (383). Knavishly merry, merrily mischievous, frolicksome.

WAGGISHNESS, wăg'ĭsh-nĕs. s. Merry mischief.

To WAGGLE, wăg'gl. v. n. (405). To waddle, to move from side to side.

WAGON, wăg'ŭn. s. (166). A heavy carriage for burdens; a chariot.

WAGONNER, wăg'ŭn-ŭr. s. (98). One who drives a wagon.

WAGTAIL, wăg'tâle. s. A bird. Generally called a Water-wagtail.

WAID, wâde. a. (202). Crushed. Obsolete.

WAIF, wâfe. s. Goods found and claimed by nobody. That of which every one waives the claim. Sometimes written weif or weft. This, says Mr. Mason, is a legal word, but not legally explained; since Blackstone says Waifs are goods stolen and waived, or thrown away by the thief in his flight.

To WAIL, wâle. v. a. To moan, to lament, to bewail.

To WAIL, wâle. v. n. (202). To grieve audibly, to express sorrow.

WAIL, wâle. s. Audible sorrow.

WAINSCOT, wĕn'skŭt. s. The inner wooden covering of a wall.

To WAINSCOT, wĕn'skŭt. v. a. To line walls with boards; to line in general.

☞ I have given the common sound of this word; and as it is marked by Mr. Sheridan, Dr. Kenrick, Mr. Scott, and adopted in Steele's Grammar. Mr. Perry pronounces the first syllable so as to rhyme with man; but W. Johnston, who pronounces both this word and Waistcoat regularly, is, in my opinion the most correct.

WAIST, wâste. s. The smallest part of the body, the part below the ribs; the middle deck of a ship.

WAISTCOAT, wĕs'kŏt. s. A garment worn about the waist. The garment worn by men under the coat.—Ash.

☞ This word has fallen into the general contraction observable in similar compounds, but, in my opinion, not so irrecoverably as some have done. It would scarcely sound pedantic if both parts of the word were pronounced with equal distinctness; though Mr. Sheridan and Mr. Scott pronounce the diphthong as I have marked it.

To WAIT, wâte. v. a. To expect, to stay for; to attend, to accompany with submission or respect; to attend as a consequence of something.

To WAIT, wâte. v. n. To expect, to stay in expectation; to pay servile or submissive attendance; to attend; to stay, not to depart from; to follow as a consequence.

To WAIVE, wāve. v. a. To put off, to quit, to relinquish.

☞ I have inserted this word on the authority of Blackstone, quoted by Mr. Mason, as may be seen under the word WAIF, and I remember to have seen it spelled in this manner, though I cannot recollect by whom. Its etymology is uncertain; but, distinguishing it from the word WAVE, from which it can scarcely be derived, is of real utility to the language, which, as much as possible, ought to adopt a different orthography to express a different sense, or a different pronunciation.—See BOWL.

To WAKE, wāke. v. n. To watch, not to sleep; to be roused from sleep, to cease to sleep; to be put in action, to be excited.

To WAKE, wāke. v. a. To rouse from sleep; to excite, to put in motion or action; to bring to life again, as if from the sleep of death.

To WAMBLE, wŏm'bl. v. n. (405). To roll with nausea and sickness. It is used of the stomach.

WAN, wŏn. a. (85). Pale as with sickness, languid of look.

☞ Mr. Sheridan has given the a, in this word and its compounds, the same sound as in man. Mr. Scott and Dr. Kenrick have given both the sound I have given and Mr. Sheridan's, but seem to prefer the former by placing it first. I have always heard it pronounced like the first syllable of wan-ton; and find Mr. Nares,

W. Johnston, and Mr. Perry, have so marked it. I have indeed, heard wan, the old preterit of the verb to win, pronounced so as to rhyme with ran: but as this form of the verb is obsolete, the pronunciation is so too.—See WASP.

WAND, wŏnd. s. A small stick or twig, a long rod; any staff of authority or use; a charming rod.

To WANDER, wŏn'dŭr. v. n. (98). To rove, to ramble here and there, to go without any certain course; to deviate, to go astray.

WASP, wŏsp. s. (85). A brisk stinging insect, in form resembling a bee.

☞ Mr. Sheridan has pronounced this word so as to rhyme with hasp, clasp, &c. This sound is so perfectly new to me, that I should have supposed it to have been an errour of the press, if Mr. Scott and Dr. Kenrick had not marked it in the same manner: Mr. Smith and Mr. Perry approached somewhat nearer to the true sound of a, by giving it the same sound as in father; but Mr. Nares and W. Johnston give it the sound of short o, like the a in was, wash, &c.: and that this is the true sound, see Principles, No. 85.

WASPISH, wŏsp'ish. a. Peevish, malignant, irritable.

WASPISHLY, wŏsp'ish-lė. ad. Peevishly.

WHORE, hôôr, or hôre. s. A woman who converses unlawfully with men, a fornicatress, an adultress, a strumpet; a prostitute, a woman who receives men for money.

☞ If there can be a polite pronunciation of this vulgar word, it is the first of these, rhyming with poor. The Stage has followed this pronunciation; Mr. Sheridan has adopted it; but Dr. Kenrick and Mr Scott give the preference to the last; and W. Johnston, Mr. Elphinston, Mr. Perry, and Barclay, adopt only the last, rhyming with more. This, it must be confessed, is the most analogical; but as it is used by the vulgar, the polite world think they depart a little from the vulgarity of the word, by departing from its genuine pronunciation.

A strong motion of the air; direction of the blast from a particular point; breath, power or act of respiration; breath modulated by an instrument; air impregnated with scent; flatulence, windiness; any thing insignificant or light, as wind; Down the wind, to decay; To take or have the wind, to have the upper-hand.

☞ These two modes of pronunciation have been long contending for superiority, till at last the former seems to have gained a complete victory, except in the territories of rhyme. Here the poets claim a privilege, and readers seem willing to grant it them, by pronouncing this word, when it ends a verse, so as to rhyme with the word it is coupled with.

" For as in bodies, thus in soul we find,
" What wants in blood and spirits, fill'd with
" wind".

But in prose this regular and analogical pronunciation borders on the antiquated and pedantick.

What could have been the cause of this deviation from the general rule in this word and gold, it is not easy to guess; they were both bound to their true sound in the fetters of rhyme; but these fetters, which are supposed to alter the pronunciation of some words by linking dissimilar sounds, have not been strong enough to restrain these from a capricious irregularity. It is not improbable that the first deviation began in the compounds, such as Goldsmith, Goldfinch, Windmill, Windward, &c. (as it is a prevailing idiom of pronunciation to shorten simples in their compounds, see Principles, No. 515, and the word Knowledge,) and these at last corrupted the simples. But whatever may have been the cause, the effect is now become so general, that reducing them to their true sound seems almost impracticable. Mr. Sheridan tells us, that Swift used to jeer those who pronounced wind with the i short, by saying, " I have a great mind to find why " you pronounce it wind." A very illiberal critic retorted this upon Mr. Sheridan, by saying, " If I may be so bould, I should be glad to be tould why you pronounce it gould." The truth is, every child knows how these words ought to be pronounced according to analogy; but it requires some judgement, and an extensive acquaintance with polite and literary circles, to know which is the most current pronunciation. Where analogy is not so evident, and yet as real as in these words, it is some credit to a speaker to depart a little from custom in favour of analogy; but where every one knows as well as ourselves what ought to be the pronunciation, and yet where every one pronounces in opposition to it, we shall get nothing but contempt by departing from the general voice. With respect to the words in question, my observation fails me, if wind, as a single word, is not more fixed in the sound of short i, than gold in the sound of o; the true sound of this last word seems not quite irrecoverable, except in the compound goldsmith; but the compounds of wind, such as windy, windmill, windward, &c. must in my opinion, be given up: nor, till some superior spirit, uniting the politeness of a Chesterfield with the genius of a Swift, descends to vindicate the rights of an injured word, do I think that wind will, in prose and familiar language, ever be a fashionable pronunciation. The language of Scripture seems to have native dignity and solemnity sufficient to authorise the long sound, but no other. Mr. Sheridan and Mr. Scott give the same preference to the first sound of this word that I have done. Dr. Kenrick and Mr. Barclay give only the short sound. Mr. Perry joins them in this sound; but says, in dramatick scenes it has the long one. Mr. Nares says, it has certainly the short sound in common usage, but that all our best poets rhyme it with mind, kind, &c.; and Mr. Smith observes, that it is now the polite pronunciation, though against analogy.

WORTHY, wŭr'*th*é. s. A man laudable for any eminent quality, particularly for valour.

To WOT, wŏt. v. n. To know, to be aware.

☞ Mr. Elphinston is singular in pronouncing this word so as to rhyme with but ; Mr. Sheridan, Mr. Scott, W. Johnston, Mr. Perry, and Mr. Smith, rhyme it with not.

WOVE, wŏve. The Pret. and Part. pass. of Weave.

WOVEN, wŏ'v'n. (103). The Part. pass. of Weave.

WOULD, wŭd. (320). The Pret. of Will; it is generally used as an auxiliary verb with an infinitive, to which it gives the force of the substantive mood ; was or am resolved, wish or wished to ; it is a familiar for Wish to do, or to have.—See BEEN.

WOULD-BE, wŭd'bé. a. Foolishly pretending to be.—Mason.

WOUND, wŏ̂nd, or wŏ̂und. s. (315). A hurt given by violence.

☞ The first pronunciation of this word, though generally received among the polite world, is certainly a capricious novelty : a novelty either generated by false criticism to distinguish it from the preterit of the verb to wind, of which there was not the least danger of interference (see BOWL); or more probably from an affectation of the French sound of this diphthong, which, as in four, and some other words, we find of late to have prevailed. The Stage is in possession of this sound ; and what Swift observes of newspapers with respect to the introduction of new and fantastical words, may be applied to the Stage, with respect to new and fantastical modes of pronunciation, (see SIGH). That the other pronunciation was the established sound of this word, appears from the poets, who rhyme it with bound, found, ground, and around, and is still so among the great bulk of speakers, who learn this sound at school, and are obliged to unlearn it again when they come into the conversation of the polite world. Mr. Sheridan, Mr. Scott, and Mr. Elphinston, adopt the first sound of this word ; but Dr. Kenrick and W. Johnston the second ; Mr. Perry gives both, but prefers the first ; and though Mr. Smith, in his Vocabulary, has classed it with sound and found, says wound is the common pronunciation. I am, however, of Mr. Nares's opinion, who says this pronunciation ought to be entirely banished. But where is the man bold enough to risk the imputation of vulgarity by such an expulsion ?

To WOUND, wŏ̂nd, or wŏ̂und. v. a. To hurt by violence.

WOUND, wŏ̂nd. The Pret. and Part. pass. of To wind.

WOUNDLESS, wŏ̂nd'lés. a. Exempt from wounds.

WOUNDWORT, wŏ̂nd'wŭrt. s. A plant.

WRACK, răk. s. Properly WRECK. Destruction of a ship ; ruin, destruction. See SHIPWRECK.

To WRACK, răk. v. a. (474). To destroy in the water, to wreck, it seems in Milton to mean, to rack, to shake ; to torture, to torment.

To WRANGLE, răng'gl. v. n. (405). To dispute peevishly, to quarrel perversely.

WRANGLE, răng'gl. s. A quarrel, a perverse dispute.

WRANGLER, răng'gl-ŭr. s. A perverse, peevish, disputative man.

To WRAP, răp. v. a. (474). To roll together, to complicate ; to involve ; to cover with something rolled or thrown round; to comprise, to contain : To wrap up, to involve totally ; to transport, to put in ecstasy.

☞ This word is often pronounced rop, rhyming with top, even by speakers much above vulgar. They have a confused idea, that a preceding w makes the a broad, and do not attend to the intervening r, which bars the power of the w, and necessarily preserves the a in its short Italian sound. Mr. Sheridan, Mr. Scott, W. Johnston, Dr. Kenrick, Mr. Perry, and Mr. Smith, pronounce it as I have done.

WRAPPER, răp'pŭr. s. (98). One who wraps ; that in which any thing is wrapped.

WRATH, rŏ*th*, or răth. s. (474). Anger, fury, rage.

☞ The first pronunciation of this word is by far the more usual, but the last is more analogical. The w has no power over the a, for the same reason as in the preceding word. A want of attending to this, and, perhaps, confounding this word with the obsolete adjective wroth, are the reasons of the present currency of this erroneous pronunciation. Mr. Sheridan, Mr. Scott, W. Johnston, Dr. Kenrick, Mr. Nares, and Mr. Smith adopt the first sound; and Mr. Perry alone the last; but in a case where analogy is so clear, his authority ought, in my opinion, to outweigh them all.

WRATHFUL, rŏth'fŭl, or rāth'fŭl. a. Angry, furious, raging.

WRATHFULLY, rŏth'fŭl-ē, or rāth'fŭl-lē. ad. Furiously, passionately.

WRATHLESS, rŏth'lĕs, or rāth'lĕs. a. Free from anger.

To WREAK, rēke. v. a. Old Pret. and Part. pass. Wroke. To revenge; to execute any violent design.

☞ The diphthong in this word has the sound I have given it, in Sheridan, Scott, W. Johnston, Dr. Kenrick, Perry, Smith, and Barclay.

WREAK, rēke. s. (474). Revenge, vengeance; passion, furious fit.

WREAKFUL, rēke'fŭl. a. Revengeful, angry.

WREATH, rēth, or rēthe. s. (467). Any thing curled or twisted; a garland, a chaplet.

☞ I have placed what I think the best usual mode of pronouncing this word first, because I think it so much more agreeable to analogy than the second. Nouns and verbs spelled alike, and ending with a hissing consonant, seem throughout the whole language to be distinguished from each other by the former giving the sharp, and the latter the flat sound to the consonant. See Principles, No. 437, 467, 499.

To WREATH, rēthe. v. a. Preterit. Wreathed; Part. pass. Wreathed, Wreathen. To curl, to twist, to convolve; to interweave, to entwine one in another; to encircle as with a garland.

WREATHY, rē'thē. a. Spiral, curled, twisted.

WRECK, rĕk. s. (474). Destruction by being driven on rocks or shallows at sea; dissolution by violence; ruin, destruction.—See SHIPWRECK.

☞ Mr. Sheridan alone has given the sound of a to the e in this word; Mr. Scott, W. Johnston, Dr. Kenrick, Mr. Perry, and Mr. Smith, pronounce it as I have done.

To WRECK, rĕk. v. a. To destroy by dashing on rocks or sands; to ruin.

To WRECK, rĕk. v. n. To suffer wreck.

WREN, rĕn. s. (474). A small bird.

To WRENCH, rĕnsh. v. a. To pull by violence, to wrest, to force; to sprain, to distort.

WRENCH, rĕnsh. s. (474). A violent pull or twist; a sprain.

To WREST, rĕst. v. a. To twist by violence, to extort by writhing or force; to distort, to writhe, to force.

WREST, rĕst. s. (474). Distortion, violence.

WRESTER, rĕs'tŭr. s. He who wrests.

To WRESTLE, rĕs'sl. v. n. (472). To contend who shall throw the other down: to struggle, to contend.

WRESTLER, rĕs'lŭr. s. (98). One who wrestles, one who professes the athletick art; one who contends in wrestling.

WRETCH, rĕtsh. s. A miserable mortal; a worthless sorry creature; it is used by way of slight ironical pity or contempt.

WRETCHED, rĕtsh'ĕd. a. (366). Miserable, unhappy; calamitous, afflictive, sorry, pitiful, paltry, worthless; despicable, hatefully contemptible.

WRETCHEDLY, rĕtsh'ĕd-lē. ad. Miserably, unhappily; meanly, despicably.

WRETCHEDNESS, rĕtsh'ĕd-nĕs. s. Misery, unhappiness, afflicted state; pitifulness, despicableness.

To WRIGGLE, rĭg'gl. v. n. (405). To move to and fro with short motions.

To WRIGGLE, rĭg'gl. v. a. (474). To put in a quick reciprocating motion.

WRIGHT, rīte. s. (293) (474). A workman, an artificer, a maker, a manufacturer.

To WRING, rĭng. v. a. Pret. and Part. pass. Wringed and Wrung. To twist, to turn round by violence; to force out of any body by contortion; to squeeze, to press: to writhe; to pinch; to force by violence, to extort; to harass, to distress, to torture; to distort, to turn to a wrong purpose; to persecute with extortion.

To WRING, rĭng. v. n. (474). To writhe with anguish.

WRINGER, rĭng'ŭr. s. (98). One who squeezes the water out of clothes.

WRINKLE, rĭnk'kl. s. (405). Corrugation or furrow of the skin in the face; any roughness.

To WRINKLE, rĭnk'kl. v. a. To corrugate, to contract into furrows; to make rough or uneven.

WRIST, rĭst. s. (474). The joint by which the hand is joined to the arm.

To WRITHE, rĭTHe. v. n. To be convolved with agony or torture.

WRITING, rĭ'tĭng. s. (410). A legal instrument; a composure, a book; a written paper of any kind.

WRITINGMASTER, rĭ'tĭng-măs'tŭr. s. One who teaches to write.

WRITTEN, rĭt'tn. a. (103). The Part. pass. of Write.

WRONG, rŏng. s. An injury, a designed or known detriment; errour, not right.

WRONG, rŏng. a. (474). Not morally right, not agreeable to propriety or truth; not physically right, unfit, unsuitable.

WRONG, rŏng. ad. Not rightly, amiss.

To WRONG, rŏng. v. a. To injure, to use unjustly.

WRONGDOER, rŏng'dōō'ŭr. s. An injurious person.

WRONGER, rŏng'ŭr. (98) (409). He that injures, he that does wrong.

WRONGFUL, rŏng'fŭl. a. Injurious, unjust.

WRONGFULLY, rŏng'fŭl-ĕ. ad. Unjustly.

WRONGHEAD, rŏng'hĕd. } a.
WRONGHEADED, rŏng-hĕd'ĕd. }
Having a perverse understanding.

WRONGLY, rŏng'lĕ. ad. Unjustly amiss.

WRONGLESSLY, rŏng'lĕs-lĕ. ad. Without injury to any.

WROTE, rōte. Pret. and Part. of Write.

WROTH, rŏth. a.—See WRATH. Angry. Out of use.

WROUGHT, rawt. The Pret. and Part. pass. as it seems, of Work, (319) (393). Effected, performed; influenced, prevailed on; produced, caused; worked, laboured; gained, attained; operated; worked; actuated; manufactured; formed; exited by degrees; guided, managed; agitated, disturbed.

WRUNG, rŭng. The Pret. and Part. pass. of Wring.

WRY, rī. a. (474). Crooked, deviating from the right direction; distorted; wrung, perverted, wrested.

To WRY, rī. v. n. To be contorted and writhed, to deviate from the right direction.

X.

X, says Johnson, is a letter which, though found in Saxon words, begins no word in the English language.

☞ It may be observed, that in words from the Greek, where it is initial, it is always pronounced like Z. For the true pronunciation of this letter, when medial or final in English words, see Principles, No. 476.

XEROCOLLYRIUM, zē-rō-kŏl-lĭr'ē-ŭm. s. A dry plaster for sore eyes.

XERODES, zē-rō'dēz. s. Any tumour attended with dryness.

XEROMIRUM, zēr-ō-mī'rŭm. s. (503). A drying ointment.

XEROPHAGY, zē-rŏf'ă-jē. s. (518). The eating of dry meats, a sort of fast among the Primitive Christians.

XEROPHTHALMY, zē-rŏp'thăl-mē. s. A dry red soreness or itching in the eyes, without any dropping or swelling.

☞ (559).—Fāte, fār, fāll, fāt;—mē, mĕt;—pīne, pĭn;—

XEROTES, zē-rō'tēz. s. (503). A dry habit or disposition of the body.

XIPHIAS, zĭf'ē-ās. s. The sword fish; also a comet shaped like a sword.

XIPHOIDES, zē-fŏē'dēz. s. The pointed sword-like cartilage or gristle of the breast bone.

XYLOBALSAMUM, zī-lō-bāl'sā-mŭm. s. The wood of the balsam tree.

XYSTER, zĭs'tŭr. s. A surgeon's instrument to scrape and shave bones with.

Y.

YACHT, yŏt. s. (356). A small ship for carrying passengers.

☞ This word is pronounced as I have marked it, by Mr. Sheridan, Mr. Scott, W. Johnston, Mr. Perry, Mr. Nares, and Mr. Smith; Dr. Kenrick pronounces it yat, rhyming with bat; and Mr. Barclay yaut, rhyming with nought.

YAM, yām. s. A root that grows in America and the South-Sea Islands.—Mason.

YARD, yārd. s. (78). Enclosed ground adjoining to a house; a measure of three feet; the supports of the sails of a ship.

YARE, yāre. a. Ready, dextrous, eager.

YARELY, yāre'lē. ad. Dextrously, skilfully.

YARN, yārn. s. (78). Spun wool, woollen thread.

YARROW, yăr'rō. s. (81). A plant which grows wild on the dry banks, and is used in medicine.

YAWL, yâwl. s. (219). A little vessel belonging to a ship, for convenience of passing to and from it.

To YAWN, yâwn. v. n. (219). To gape, to have the mouth opened involuntarily; to open wide; to express desire by yawning.

YAWN, yâwn. s. Oscitation; gape, hiatus.

YAWNING, yâwn'ing. a. (410). Sleeping, slumbering.

YCLAD, ē-klăd'. Part. for Clad. Cloathed.

YCLEPED, ē-klēpt'. Called, termed, named.

YE, yē. The solemn nominative plural of Thou.

YEA, yē. ad. (227). Yes.

☞ Mr. Sheridan, Mr. Scott, W. Johnston, Mr. Smith, and Mr. Fry, pronounce this word so as to rhyme with nay, pay, &c. But Steel or Brightland, Dr. Jones who wrote The new Art of Spelling in Queen Anne's time, Dr. Kenrick, and Mr. Perry, pronounce it like the pronoun ye. Though so many are against me, I do not hesitate to pronounce the latter mode the best; first, as it is more agreeable to the general sound of the diphthong; next, as it is more related to its familiar substitute yes; and lastly, unless my memory greatly fails me, because it is always so pronounced when contrasted with nay; as in that precept of the Gospel, "Let your communication be yea, yea; and nay, nay."

To YEAN, yēne. v. n. (227). To bring young. Used of sheep.

YEANLING, yēne'lĭng. s. (410). The young of sheep.

YEAR, yēre. s. (227). Twelve months: it is often used plurally, without a plural termination; in the plural, old age.

YEARLING, yēre'lĭng. a. (410). Being a year old.

YEARLY, yēre'lē. a. Annual, happening every year, lasting a year.

YEARLY, yēre'lē. ad. Annually.

To YEARN, yĕrn. v. n. (234). To feel great internal uneasiness.

To YEARN, yĕrn. v. a. To grieve, to vex.

YELK, yĕlk. s. [gealkewe, yellow, Saxon.] The yellow part of the egg.

☞ It is commonly pronounced, says Johnson, and often written Yolk. To which we may add, that when the word is so written, the l is silent, and the word pronounced Yoke. But Johnson seems justly to have preferred the former mode of writing and pronouncing this word, as more agreeable both to etymology and the best usage.

To YELL, yĕl. v. n. To cry out with horrour and agony.

YELL, yĕl. s. A cry of horrour.

YELLOW, yĕl'lō. a. Being of a bright glaring colour, as gold.

☞ Mr. Sheridan, Mr. Nares, Mr. Scott, Dr. Jones, and Mr. Fry, pronounce this word as if written yallow, rhyming with tallow. But Dr. Kenrick, W. Johnston, Mr. Smith, and Mr. Perry preserve the e in its pure sound, and rhyme the word with mellow. The latter mode is, in my opinion, clearly the best, both as more agreeable to analogy, and the best usage; for I am much deceived if the former pronunciation does not border closely on the vulgar.

YELLOWBOY, yĕl'lō-bŏe. s. A gold coin. A very low word.

YELLOWHAMMER, yĕl'lō-hăm-mŭr. s. A bird.

YELLOWISH, yĕl'lō-ĭsh. a. Approaching to yellow.

YELLOWISHNESS, yĕl'lō-ĭsh-nĕs. s. The quality of approaching to yellow.

YELLOWNESS, yĕl'lō-nĕs. s. The quality of being yellow: it is used in Shakespeare for jealousy.

YELLOWS, yĕl'lōze. s. A disease in horses.

To YELP, yĕlp. v. n. To bark as a beagle hound after his prey.

YEOMAN, yō'măn. s. (260). A man of a small estate in land, a farmer, a gentleman farmer; it seems to have been anciently a kind of ceremonious title given to soldiers as Yeomen of the guard; it was probably a freeholder not advanced to the rank of a gentleman.

☞ Junius gives us a great variety of derivations of this word, but seems most to approve of that from gaeman in the old Frisick, signifying a countryman or villager; and this word is derived farther by Junius from the Greek γαια, γαια, γη, which he tells us does not only signify the earth in general, but any portion of land. Skinner says it may be derived from the Anglo-Saxon Gemæne, or the Teutonic Gemein, a common man, or one of the commonalty; or from Eowman, a shepherd; from Goodman, an appellation given to inferior people; from Gemana, a companion; from Geongman, a young man; from Yeman, an ordinary man, or any body, like the Spanish Hidalgo; but he prefers its derivation from the Anglo-Saxon Guma, a painful or laborious man.

But however etymologists are divided in the derivation of this word, orthoepists are not less different in their pronunciation of it. Mr. Sheridan, Mr. Scott, Mr. Coote, (author of the Elements of Grammar,) Steele's Grammar, (published in Queen Anne's time,) Mr. Barclay, Mr. Smith, and Buchanan, pronounce it with the diphthong short, as if written yĕmman; Dr. Kenrick pronounces it as if written yămman; Mr. Elphinston, (who quotes Langham, the famous reformer of orthography in Queen Elizabeth's time, for the same pronunciation,) sounds the eo like ee; and Dr. Jones, the author of the New Art of Spelling in Queen Anne's time, pronounces it in the same manner. To which we may add Ben Jonson, who says, that yeoman, people, and jeopardy, were truer written yĕman, pĕple, jĕpardy. But W. Johnston, Mr. Perry, Entick and Fry, pronounce the eo like long open o, as if written yōman; and this last appears to me to be the most received pronunciation. It is that which is constantly heard applied to the King's body guard, and it is that which has always been the pronunciation on the Stage; an authority which, in this case, may not, perhaps, improperly be called the best echo of the publick voice. I well remember hearing Mr. Garrick pronounce the word in this manner, in a speech in King Lear; "Tell me, "fellow, is a madman a gentleman, or a "yōman?"

YEOMANRY, yō'măn-rĕ. s. (260). The collective body of yeomen.

To YERK, yĕrk. v. a. To throw out or move with a spring.

YERK, yĕrk. s. A quick motion.

To YERN, yĕrn. v. a.—See YEARN.

YES, yĕs. ad. (101). A term of affirmation; the affirmative particle opposed to No.

☞ This word is worn into a somewhat slenderer sound than what is authorised by the orthography; but e and i are frequently interchangeable, and few changes can be better established than this. W. Johnston and Mr. Perry are the only orthoepists who give the sound of the vowels, that do not mark this change; but Mr. Sheridan, Mr. Scott, Dr. Kenrick, Mr. Nares, Mr. Smith, and Dr. Jones in his New Art of Spelling, confirm this change, and rhyme it with hiss, miss, bliss, &c.—See BEEN and DESPATCH.

YEST, yĕst. s. The foam, spume, or flower of beer in fermentation; barm; the spume on a troubled sea.

☞ (559)—Fāte, fār, fāll, fāt;—mē, mēt;—pine, pin;—

☞ Dr. Johnson has very properly spelled this word yest, from the Saxon gest, and not yeast as we sometimes see it; and this spelling decides its pronunciation. Dr. Jones spells it yeast, and gives the diphthong its long sound; Mr. Nares pronounces the word in the same manner, but spells it yest; Dr. Kenrick spells it yest, but rhymes it with mist; Mr. Barclay pronounces it yeest; Mr Perry writes it yeast and yest; but Mr Sheridan, Mr. Scott, and Mr. Smith, write it as Dr. Johnson has done, and pronounce it as I have done; and I think not only more agreeable to analogy, which forbids us to pronounce e long, when followed by st in the same syllable, (see LEST,) but, if I mistake not, more consonant to polite usage. The vulgar do not only pronounce the diphthong long, but sink the y, and reduce the word to east.

YESTY, yĕs'tē. a. Frothy, spumy.

YESTER, yĕs'tŭr. a. Being next before the present day.

YESTERDAY, yĕs'tŭr-dā. s. The day last past, the next day before to-day.

☞ Though yes, from its continual use, is allowably worn into the somewhat easier sound of yis, there is no reason why yesterday should not adopt the same change; and though I cannot pronounce this change vulgar, since Mr. Sheridan, Dr. Kenrick, Mr. Nares, and Mr. Scott have adopted it, I do not hesitate to pronounce the regular sound given by W. Johnston as the more correct, and agreeable to the best usage.

YESTERNIGHT, yĕs'tŭr-nīte. s. The night before this night.

YET, yĕt. conjunct. Nevertheless, notwithstanding, however.

☞ The e in this word is frequently changed by incorrect speakers into i; but though this change is agreeable to the best and most established usage in the word yes; in yet it is the mark of incorrectness and vulgarity.

Dr. Kenrick is the only orthoëpist who gives any countenance to this incorrectness, by admitting it as a second pronunciation; but Mr. Sheridan, Mr Scott, W. Johnston, Mr. Perry, and Mr. Smith, give the regular sound only.

YET, yĕt. ad. Besides, over and above; still, the state still remaining the same; once again; at this time, so soon, hitherto, with a negative before it; at least; it notes increase or extension of the sense of the words to which it is joined; still, in a new degree; even, after all; hitherto.

YEW, yōō. s. A tree of tough wood.

TO YIELD, yēēld. v. a. (275). To produce, to give in return for cultivation or labour; to produce in general; to afford, to exhibit; to give as claimed of right; to allow, to permit; to emit, to expire; to resign, to give up; to surrender.

TO YIELD, yēēld. v. n. To give up the conquest, to submit; to comply with any person; to comply with things; to concede, to admit, to allow, not to deny; to give place as inferiour in excellence or any other quality.

YIELDER, yēēld'ŭr. s. One who yields.

YOKE, yōke. s. The bandage placed on the neck of draught oxen; a mark of servitude, slavery; a chain, a link, a bond; a couple, two, a pair.

TO YOKE, yōke. v. a. To bind by a yoke or carriage; to join or couple with another; to enslave, to subdue; to restrain, to confine.

YOKE-ELM, yōke'ĕlm. s. A tree.

YOKEFELLOW, yōke'fĕl-lō. } s. Companion in labour; mate, fellow.
YOKEMATE, yōke'māte. }

YOLK, yōke. s. The yellow part of an egg.—See YELK.

YON, yŏn. } a. Being at a distance within view.
YONDER, yŏn'dŭr. (98). }

☞ There is a vulgar pronunciation of this word in London, as if written yander. This cannot be too carefully avoided.

YORE, yōre. ad. Long; of old time, long ago.

YOU, yōō. pron. (8) (315). The oblique case of Ye; it is used in the nominative; it is the ceremonial word for the second person singular, and is always used, except in solemn language.

YOUNG, yŭng. a. Being in the first part of life, not old; ignorant, weak; it is sometimes applied to vegetable life.

YOUNG, yŭng. s. (314). The offspring of animals collectively.

YOUNGISH, yŭng'ĭsh. a. (381). Somewhat young.

YOUNGLING, yŭng'lĭng. s. (410). Any creature in the first part of life.

YOUNGLY, yŭng'lē. ad. (381). Early in life; ignorantly, weakly.

YOUNGSTER, yŭng'stŭr. } s. Ludicrously, a young person.
YOUNKER, yŭnkg'ŭr. (98). }

YOUR, yōōr. pron. Belonging to you: Yours is used when the substantive goes before or is understood, as, This is your book, This book is yours.

☞ This word is nearly under the same predicament as the pronoun My. When the emphasis is upon this word, it is always pronounced full and open, like the noun Ewer; as, "The moment I had read "Your letter I sat down to write Mine;" but when it is not emphatical, it generally sinks into yur, exactly like the last syllable of Law-yer; as, "I had just answered yur first letter as yur last arrived." Here, if we were to say, "I had just answerd your first letter as your last arrived," with your sounded full and open like ewer, as in the former sentence, every delicate ear would be offended. This obscure sound of the possessive pronoun your always takes place when it is used to signify any species of persons or things in an indeterminate sense. Thus Addison, speaking of those metaphors which professional men most commonly fall into, says, "Your men "of business usually have recourse to such "instances as are too mean and familiar." Spectator, No. 421.

YOURSELF, yûr-sêlf'. s. You, even you; ye, not others.

☞ The pronunciation of your in this word is a confirmation of the observations on the foregoing word.

YOUTH, yo͞o*th*. s. The part of life succeeding to childhood and adolescence; a young man; young men.

YOUTHFUL, yo͞o*th*'fûl. a. Young; suitable to the first part of life; vigorous as in youth.

YOUTHFULLY, yo͞o*th*'fûl-ė. ad. In a youthful manner.

YOUTHY, yo͞o*th*'ė. a. (381). Young, youthful.

Z.

For the true Name of this Letter, see Principles, No. 483.

ZANY, zā'nė. s. One employed to raise laughter by his gestures, actions, and speeches; a merry-andrew, a buffoon.

ZEAL, zēle. s. Passionate ardour for any person or cause.

ZEALOT, zĕl'ŭt, or zė'lŭt. s. (235). One passionately ardent in any cause. Generally used in dispraise.

☞ There are few words better confirmed by authority in their departure from the sound of their simple than this and the following word. Dr. Ash and Bailey are the only lexicographers who (if we may judge by the position of the accent) give the long sound to this word, as in zeal; and even these give the short sound to zealous. Dr. Kenrick gives both sounds to both words, but prefers the short sound by placing it first: but Mr. Elphinston, Mr. Sheridan, Mr. Scott, W. Johnston, Mr. Nares, Mr. Smith, Mr. Perry, Barclay, and Entick, give both these words the short sound. As the word zealous may either come from the Latin zelus, (or rather zelosus,) or be a formative of our own from zeal, as villanous, libellous, &c. from villain, libel, &c. analogy might very allowably be pleaded for the long sound of the diphthong; and if custom were less decided, I should certainly give my vote for it; but as propriety of pronunciation may be called a compound ratio of usuage and analogy, the short sound must in this case be called the proper one.—See KNOWLEDGE, and Principles, No. 515.

ZEALOUS, zĕl'ŭs, or zė'lŭs. a. Ardently passionate in any cause.

ZEALOUSLY, zĕl'ŭs-lė, or zė'lŭs-lė. ad. With passionate ardour.

ZEALOUSNESS, zĕl'ŭs-nĕs, or zė'lŭs-nĕs. s. The quality of being zealous.

ZECHIN, tshė-kēēn'. s. A gold coin worth about nine shillings sterling.

ZED, zĕd, or ĭz'zŭrd. s. The name of the letter z. The last of the English alphabet.

☞ For the proper name of this letter, see Principles, No. 483.

ZENITH, zė'nĭ*th*. s. The point over head opposite the nadir.

☞ I never once called in doubt the pronunciation of this word, till I was told that mathematicians generally made the first syllable short. Upon consulting our orthöepists, I find all who have the word, and who give the quantity of the vowels, make the e long, except Entick. Thus Sheridan, Kenrick, Scott, Buchanan, W.

Johnston, and Perry, pronounce it long; and if this majority were not so great and so respectable, the analogy of words of this form ought to decide. See Principles, No. 544. See CLEFF and CONSTRUE.

ZEPHYR, zĕf'fĕr. (543). } s. The
ZEPHYRUS, zĕf'fĕr-ŭs. } west wind and poetically any calm soft wind.

ZEST, zĕst. s. The peel of an orange squeezed into wine; a relish, a taste added.

To ZEST, zĕst. v. a. To heighten by an additional relish.

ZETETICK, zē-tĕt'ĭk. a. (509). Proceeding by enquiry.

ZEUGMA, zūg'mā. s. (92). A figure in grammar, when a verb agreeing with divers nouns, or an adjective with divers substantives, is referred to one expressly, and to the other by supplement, as, Lust overcame shame, Boldness fear, and Madness reason.

ZIGZAG, zĭg'zăg. s. Any thing composed of short turns.—Ash.

☞ This is a word of ludicrous formation, but like others of the same kind, very expressive and frequently used by the best authors. Pope has very happily exemplified the use of it in his Dunciad, where he says:

"Round him much embryo, much abortion lay,
"Much future and and abdicated play;
"Nonsense precipitate like turning lead,
"That slipp'd through cracks and zig-zags of the head."

Dunciad, book i. v. 121.

ZIGZAG, zĭg'zăg. a. Having many short turnings; turning this way and that.

ZINC, zĭngk. s. (408). A semi-metal of a brilliant white colour approaching to blue.—Mason.

ZODIACK, zō'dē-ăk, or zō'jē-ăk. (293) (294) (376). The track of the sun through the twelve signs, a great circle of the sphere, containing the twelve signs.

ZONE, zōne. s. A girdle, a division of the earth.

ZOOGRAPHER, zō-ŏg'grā-fŭr. s. One who describes the nature, properties, and forms of animals.

ZOOGRAPHY, zō-ŏg'grā-fē. s. (518). A description of the forms, natures, and properties of animals.

ZOOLOGY, zō-ŏl'lō-jē. s. (518). A treatise concerning living creatures.

ZOOPHYTE, zō'ō-fīte. s. (156). Certain vegetables or substances which partake of the nature both of vegetables and animals.

ZOOPHORICK, zō-ō-fŏr'ĭk. a. (509). In Architecture, having the figure of some animal.

ZOOPHOROUS, zō-ŏf'ō-rŭs. s. (557). The member between the architrave and the cornice, so called because it had sometimes the figures of animals carved on it.

ZOOTOMIST, zō-ŏt-tō-mĭst. s. A dissector of the bodies of brute beasts.

ZOOTOMY, zō-ŏt'tō-mē. s. (518). Dissection of the bodies of beasts.

☞ (559).—Fāte, fār, fāll, făt;—mē, mĕt;—pīne, pĭn;—

C.

CACODAEMON, kăk-ō-dē-mŏn. s. An evil spirit; the Devil. Ash.

CADUCEUS, kā-dū'sh.ē-ŭs. s. The rod or wand with which Mercury is depicted. Ash.

CADUCITY, kā-dū'sē-tē. s. Tendency to fall. Mason.

CANNIBALIZM, kăn'nē-băl-ĭzm. s. The manners of a cannibal. Mason.

CANAKIN, kă.n'ă-kĭn. s. A small can to drink out of. Mason.

CAPILLARY, kăp'pĭl-lā-rē. a. This word is accented on the second syllable in the Dictionary instead of the first. For the propriety of this latter accentuation, see PAPILLARY.

CARIATIDES, kā-rē-ăt'ē-dēz. s. The Cariatides in architecture are an order of pillars resembling women.

CATALECTIC, kăt-ā-lĕk'tĭk. a. (In Poetry). A verse wanting a syllable. Ash.

CATGUT, kăt'gŭt. s. A kind of cord or gut of which fiddle-strings are made; a kind of canvas for ladies' work. Ash.

☞ Either I have been misinformed, or these strings are made in Italy of the guts of goats; and therefore ought properly to be called Goatgut.

CENTENNIAL, sĕn-tĕn'nē-ăl. s. Consisting of a hundred years. Mason.

CENTIPEDE, sĕn'tē-pēd. s.

☞ Biped and Quadruped are spelled in Johnson without the final e, while Solipede, Palmipede, Plumipede, Multipede, and Centipede, retain it. The orthography in this case is of importance to the pronunciation; and therefore as the words are of perfectly similar original, their spelling and pronunciation ought certainly to be alike. Biped and Quadruped are the words most in use; and as they have omitted the final e, which there does not seem to be any reason to retain, we may infer, that the silent and insensible operation of custom has directed us to do the same by the rest of the words, and to pronounce the last syllable short. See MILLIPEDES.

CHAPERON, shăp-ŭr-rōn'. s. A kind of hood or cap worn by the knights of the garter in the habit of their order. Ash.

☞ For the pronunciation of the last syllable, see the word ENCORE.

CHATTY, tshăt'tē. a. Liberal of conversation. Mason.

CICUTA, sē-kū'tă. s. (91). A genus of plants; water-hemlock. Mason.

CIRCUITOUS, sŭr-kū'ē-tŭs. a. Round about. Mason.

CIRCUMLOCUTORY, sŭr-kŭm-lŏk'ū-tō-rē. a. Depending on circumlocution. Mason.

CIRCUMROTATORY, sŭr-kŭm-rō'tă-tō-rē. a. Whirling round. Mason.

CLOUGH, klŏŭ, or klŭf. s.

☞ When this word signifies a deep descent between hills, it seems best to pronounce it so as to rhyme with plough; and when it means an allowance in weight, to rhyme it with enough: but this distinction of sound to distinguish the different meaning of a word, however plausible, is a great inconvenience in language. For the reason, see BOWL.

COAT-CARD, kōte'kārd. s. Now corrupted into Court-card. Mason.

COLOPHONY, kŏ-lŏf'ō-nē. s. Rosin. Mason. See APPENDIX.

COMA, kō'mă. s. (91). A lethargy. Ash.

COMATOSE, kŏm-ă-tōse'. a. Lethargic. Ash.

COMBINABLE, kŏm-bī'nă-bl. a. (405). Consistent. Mason.

COMPLEXITY, kŏm-plĕks'ē-tē. s. State of being complex. Mason.

CONCESSIVE, kŏn-sĕs'sĭv. a. Yielded by way of concession. Ash.

CONSTRUCTIVE, kŏn-strŭk'tĭv. a. Tending to, or capable of construction. Ash.

CONSUETUDE, kŏn'swē-tūde. s. Custom, usage. Ash from Scott.

CONTRARY, kŏn'trā-rē. ad.

☞ This word was generally, though not uniformly, pronounced by the old poets, as it is by the vulgar at this day, with the accent on the second syllable; but seems now to be firmly fixed on the antepenultimate accent. See the word in the Dictionary, and Nares's English orthöepy, page 338.

CORNETCY, kŏr'nĕt-sē. s. The post of a cornet in the army. Mason.

COTILLON, kō-tĭl-yŏng'. s. French. A kind of dance. See ENCORE.

DOMICILIARY, dŏm-ė-sĭl'yă-rė. a. Intruding into private houses. Mason.

DRESSY, drĕs'sė. a. Showy in dress. Mason.

DRYAD, drĭ'ăd. s. A wood-nymph. Mason.

DULIA, dŭ'lė-ă. s. (91). A kind of inferiour worship; inferiour adoration. Ash. See LATRIA.

E.

EDEMATOSE, ė-dĕm-ă-tŏse'. a. Swellings full of humours. See the latter end of the Appendix.

ELEGIST, ĕl'ė-jĭst. s. A writer of elegies.

ELECTIONEERING, ė-lĕk-shŭn-ėėr'ĭng. s. Concern in parliamentary elections. Mason.

EMBASEMENT, ĕm-bâse'mĕnt. s. Depravation. Mason.

EMERITED, ė-mĕr'ĭt-ĕd. a. Allowed to have done sufficient public service. Mason.

EMIGRANT, ĕm'ė-grânt. s. One that emigrates. Mason.

EMMENAGOGUES, ĕm-mĕn'ă-gŏgs. s. This word is mis-spelled in the Dictionary, having but one m instead of two.

To ENDENIZEN, ĕn-dĕn'ė-zĕn. v. a. To naturalize. Mason.

To ENERGIZE, ĕn'ĕr-jize. v. n. To act with energy. Mason.

To ENSNARE, ĕn-snâre'. v. a. The same as INSNARE. Mason.

ENTIRETY, ĕn-tire'tė. s. Completeness. Mason.

☞ This word, though very expressive, is ill-formed, as it in some measure clashes with that numerous class of words ending in ity, where the i makes a distinct syllble; but as this word is a formation of our own, we must be careful to pronounce it in three syllables.

ENVY, ĕn'vē. s.

☞ The ancient pronunciation of this word was with the accent on the last, and the y sounded like eye, as the Scotch pronounce it at this day.

EPAULET, ĕp-āw-lĕt'. s. A military shoulder ornament. Mason.

EPICURISM, ĕp'ē-kū-rĭsm. s. The principles of Epicurus. Mason.

☞ Mr. Mason tells us, that this word should have the accent on the third syllable. For my own part, I think the explanation as faulty as the accentuation. It should seem that Epicureanism is an attachment to the doctrines of Epicurus; and that Epicurism is formed from the word Epicure, which signifies a sensualist.

ERUDITE, ĕr-ū-dīte'. a. Learned. Mason.

ESSAYIST, ĕs'sā-ĭst. s. One who makes essays. Ash.

ETCHING, ĕtsh'ĭng. s. An impression of a copper-plate taken after the manner cited, from Harris by Johnson, under ETCH. Mason.

G.

GALOCHE, gā-lŏshe'. s. A man's shoe (without straps or other fastening) Made to wear over another shoe. Mason.

GASTRILOQUIST, gās-trĭl'ō-kwĭst. s. One who speaks from the belly.

GAZET, gā-zĕt'. s. A small Venetian coin; the price of a newspaper; whence probably arose the name of Gazette.

GEMINI, jĕm'ē-nī. s. The twins; the third sign in the zodiack. Mason

GENTILES, jĕn'tĭlz. s. A gentile substantive, is a noun which distinguishes the people of different countries; as a Venetian, a native of Venice. A gentile adjective is an adjective formed from this substantive, as a Venetian domino.

—nó, móve, nór, nót ;—túbe, túb, búll ;—óil ;—póund ;—thin, THIS.

GRANAM, grân'âm. s. A ludicrous word for grandam. Mason.

GRAPHIC, grâf'ík. a. Well described, delineated. Ash.

GREEKLING, grèèk'líng. s. A smatterer in Greek.

To GREET, grèèt. v. a. To Wail. Mason.

GUERDON.

☞ Since I wrote the observations on this word in the Dictionary, I have found that Ben Jonson classes the gu with the same letters in anguish ; but as these letters are unaccented in the last word, the analogy is different, and the sound I have given remains still more agreeable to rule.

H.

HAMADRYADES, hâm-â-drí'â-dèz. s. Nymphs of the woods and groves. Singular, Hamadryad.

HARICOT, hâr'é-kó. s. French. A kind of ragout; generally made of meat steaks and cut roots. Mason.

HAUT-GOUT, hó-góó'. s. French. Any thing with a strong scent. Mason.

HENDECASYLLABLE, hén-dék-â-sil'lâ-bl. A line or verse consisting of eleven syllables. Ash.

HERALDIC, hé-râl'dík. a. Relating to Heraldry. Mason.

HEXASTICON, héks-âs'té-kón. s. A poem or epigram in six lines. Ash.

HIERARCHAL, hí-é-rárk'âl. a. Of an hierarch. Mason.

HURRY SKURRY, hûr'ré-skûr'ré. ad. A word formed to exhibit its own meaning wildly. Mason.

HUSSAR, hûz-zâr'. s. One of the Hungarian horsemen, so called from the shout they generally make at the first onset. Ash.

HYDROCELE, hí-dró-sé'lé. s.

☞ This word, like all of the same origin and form, as bubonocele, enterocele, bronchocele, spermatocele, sarcocele, &c. ought to be pronounced with the final e forming a syllable; for as they are perfectly Greek words, as ὑδροκηλη, or formed from the Greek, as Enterocele from Εντερον and κηλη, they ought to be pronounced like apostrophe, hyperbole, &c. The reason why Diastyle and Osteocope are not pronounced so as to make the final e form a distinct syllable, is, that they are not perfectly Greek words, but formed from διὰ and στυλος, and οστεον and κοπτω, where we find the Greek termination altered.

I.

IDENTIFY, í-dén'té-fí. v. a. To make two things the same.

IDYL, í'díl. s.

☞ As there is sometimes an erroneous pronunciation of this word by making the i short, as in the first syllable of idiot, I have thought it necessary here to quote the authorities for pronouncing it long, as in idle; namely, Mr. Sheridan, Mr. Scott, Mr. Perry, Buchanan, and Entick; Dr. Ash, Barclay, and Fenning, do not distinguish it by the position of the accent from the i in idiot; and Dr. Kenrick, as is usual with him when any thing difficult occurs, does not mark it, or divide it into syllables. But the authorities I have produced are sufficient to vindicate the long sound of i, without recurring to the diphthong in εἰδυλλιον, as the Greek and Latin quantity are uncertain and fallacious guides to the quantity of English words. See Principles, No. 544, 545, &c.

IMPOLITE, ím-pó-líte'. a. Unpolished, rude, coarse. Ash from Scott.

IMPOLITENESS, ím-pó-líte'nés. s. Want of politeness. Mason.

IMPORTUNACY, ím-pór'tú-ná-sé. s. The act of importuning. Mason.

IMPROMPTU, ím-prómp'tú. s. A short extemporaneous composition. Mason.

INAPTITUDE, ín-áp'té-túde. s. Unfitness. Mason.

INDECISION, ín-dé-sízh'ún. s. Want of determination. Mason.

INEFFICIENT, ín-éf-físh'ént, a. Ineffective. Mason.

INFANTINE, ín'fán-tíne. a. Suitable to an infant. Mason.

INFERABLE, ín-fér'â-bl. a. (405). To be inferred. Mason.

INSANITY, ín-sán'é-té. s. The state of being insane, madness. Mason.

INSENTIENT, ín-sén'shé-ént. a. Not having perception. Mason.

INTEGRANT, ín'té-grânt. a. Necessary for making up an integer. Mason.

INTENSITY, ín-tén'sé-té. s. Intenseness. Ash.

☞ (559).—Fāte, fār, fall, fât;—mè, mĕt;—pine, pĭn;—

INTESTINAL, ĭn-tĕs'tè-nal. a.
☞ This word is sometimes pronounced with the accent on the third syllable, because the i in intestinum is long; but Dr. Johnson more properly makes it a formative of our own, from intestine; and even if we were to allow this adjective to be derived immediately from the Latin substantive of the same number of syllables, we may see in Principles, No. 503, h, how many exceptions there are to this rule, and how probable it is that this word is one.

INTOLERANCE, ĭn-tŏl'ĕr-ance. s. Want of toleration.

IRRITABLE, ĭr'rè-tā-bl. a. (405). Capable of being made angry. Ash.

JUDAISM, jū'dā-ĭzm. s. The religious rites of the Jews. Ash.

L.

LACONISM, lăk'ŏn-ĭsm. s. A short, pithy expression, after the manner of the Lacedemonians.

LANDAU, lăn-daw'. s. A coach whose top may occasionally be open. Mason.

LATROCINY, lăt'rō-sè-nè. s. Larceny, theft, robbery. A literal version of the Latin latrocinium, which was afterwards contracted into larceny. Mason.
☞ It may be observed, that Dr. Johnson spells this word with an e, in the second syllable, while both its Latin and French derivation from larcin require, as Mason has shown from Blackstone, that it ought to be written larciny.

To LIBERALIZE, lĭb'ĕr-ăl-ize. v. a. To make liberal. Mason.

To LIBERATE, lĭb'ĕr-ate. v. a. (91). To free from confinement. Mason.

LIBERATION, lĭb-ĕr-ā'shŭn. s. The act of delivering, or being delivered.—— Mason.

LIQUEUR, lè-kûre'. s. A flavoured dram. Mason.

LOGOGRIPHE, lŏg'ō-grĭf. s. A kind of riddle. Ash.

M.

MANIAC, mā'nè-ăk. s. A mad person. Mason.

MANNERIST, măn'nŭr-ĭst. s. Any artist who performs all his works in one unvaried manner. Mason.

MANTOLOGY, măn-tŏl'ō-jè. s. The gift of prophesy. Mason.

MARAUDER, mā-rō'dŭr. s. A soldier that roves about in quest of plunder. Ash.

MARQUESS, mär'kwĕs. s. The right word for what is now usually written and called Marquis. Mason.

To MATERIALIZE, mā-tè'rè-ăl-ize. v. a. To regard as matter. Mason.

MATERIATE, mā-tè'rè-ât. a. (91). Consisting of matter. Ash.
☞ Thus certain adjectives formed from substantives are called materiate adjectives, as oaken from oak, wooden from wood, &c.

MAUGRE, mâw'gŭr. ad. With ill will. Mason. Notwithstanding, in spite of. Ash.

To MEANDER, mè-ăn'dŭr. v. n. To run winding, to be intricate. Mason.

MENAGERIE, mĕn-ăzhe-ŭr-è'. s. A place for keeping foreign birds, and other curious animals. Mason.

MENDICANCY, mĕn'dè-kăn-sè. s. Beggary. Mason.

MEPHITIC, mè-fĭt'ĭk. a. Ill savoured, stinking. Mason.

METEOROSCOPE, mè-tè'ŭr-ō-skōpe. s. An instrument for taking the magnitude and distances. Mason.
☞ This word, though formed from the Greek, has, like Telescope, anglicized its termination, and therefore ought not to have the final e sounded in a distinct syllable, as Mason's example from Albumazar has pronounced it.

MONOSTROPHIC, mŏn-ō-strŏf'ĭk. a. Written in unvaried metre. Mason.

MONOTONICAL, mŏn-ō-tŏn'è-kăl. a. Spoken with monotony. Mason.

MUNICIPALITY, mū-nè-sè-păl'è-tè. s. The people of a district in the division of republican France. Mason.

O.

OPTATIVE, ôp'tâ-tîv. a.

☞ Upon a more mature recollection of the analogies of the language, I am still more convinced of the justness of the decision on the accentuation of this word. A critick, with whom I lately conversed upon it, contended, that the accent ought to be upon the a, because it was on that letter in the preterperfect tense of the verb opto, optavi. I desired him to put his argument into form, and tell me, whether all words of this termination were to have the same accent as in the preterperfect tense of the verb?—here he could go no farther: I could have immediately confronted him with tentative, from tento, tentavi; with negative, from nego, negavi; with vocative, from voco, vocavi; and twenty other examples, which would have shown the weakness of his reason; and yet this gentleman is a real scholar, and a man of good sense and great acuteness. See Principles, No. 503, on the influence of the Greek and Latin accent on that of the English; No. 544, on the influence of the Greek and Latin quantity on that of the English; and No. 512, on the terminations ative and atory.

OSTEOCOPE, ôs-tê'ô-côpe.

☞ By a great oversight, this word was omitted in the Dictionary, and, by a still greater oversight, is introduced under the word Diastyle, with an s in the last syllable. This letter is the more faulty, as, without seeming to be an error, it entirely alters the meaning of the word.

OXYTONE, ôks'ê-tône. s.

☞ As I have frequently met with this word in writers on prosody, I have made use of it in the Principles, No. 499; but not having met with it in any Dictionary, I forgot to insert it, though Barytone has not escaped me. It will be necessary therefore to tell the inspector, that Oxytone comes from the Greek word ὀξύτονος, and signifies having an acute accent on the last syllable. For what the acute accent means, see BARYTONE.

S.

SATIRE, sâ'tûr. s.

☞ At line 51 of this article, after the full stop, at the word long, read, except the vowel be u. See Principles, No. 507, 508, 509. To which we may add, that though poets often bend the rhyme to their verse, when they cannot bring their verse to the rhyme; yet, where custom is equivocal, they certainly are of some weight. In this view we may look upon Pope's couplet in his Essay on Criticism:

"Leave dang'rous truths to unsuccessful sa-
"tires;
"And flattery to fulsome dedicators."

SCIOMACHY, sî-ôm'â-kê. s.

☞ Dr. Johnson's folio accents this word properly on the second syllable, (see Principles, No. 518,) but the quarto on the first.

SUBTILE, sûb'til. a. (140). Thin, fine, piercing, acute.

SUBTLE, sût'tl. a. (405). Sly, artful, cunning.

☞ These words have been used almost indiscriminately to express these different senses, as may be seen in Johnson; but as custom has adopted a different spelling and a different pronunciation, it is to be presumed it has not been without reason. That the first sense should extend itself to the latter, is not to be wondered at, as words have a tendency to fall into a bad sense; witness knave, villain, &c.; but if custom has marked this difference of sense by a difference of spelling and pronunciation, it should seem to be an effort of nature to preserve precision in our ideas. If these observations are just, the abstracts of these words ought to be kept as distinct as their concretes; from subtile ought to be formed subtilty, and from subtle, subtlety; the b being heard, in the two first, and mute in the two last.

T.

TUMULOSE, tû-mû-lôse'. a.

☞ There is a class of words in this termination which are variously accented by our Lexicographers, but which, from their derivation and form, ought certainly to be pronounced alike. This will evidently appear from the following sketch.

The variety of accentuation which this sketch exhibits, sufficiently shows how uncertain are our Dictionaries where usage is obscure. From the decided prevalence of the accent on the last syllable of these words, we may easily guess at the analogy of pronunciation, and, with very little hesitation, determine that the accent ought to be placed on the last syllable of them all.
